A Historic Mandate

In what has been the most one-sided election result in Indian history, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi led his ruling party to a brute majority in the eighth Lok Sabha. However, the sheer size of the mandate poses new problems that must be tackled.

A MOMENT comes which comes but rarely in history, when we step out from the old to the new, when an age ends and when the soul of a nation, long suppressed, finds utterance." How apt are these words in the present context. Spoken by Jawaharlal Nehru, the present prime minister's grandfather, 37 years ago on the eve of Independence, they may well come to describe the period that is now starting. India now has for the first time a leader at the helm who belongs to the post-Independence generation and one who has been elected by an unprecedented mandate—truly a case of a phase ending and the electorate finding a new voice.

The psychological importance of having a youthful prime minister cannot be underestimated and the change in approach will soon become evident as he begins to grapple with the country's problems. It is reason for hoping that a new spirit will prevail, and equally a warning that if it doesn't, then disillusionment will fast set in. Although Rajiv Gandhi did not specifically campaign for change, his youth and personality personified it more than anything else, and there is little doubt that the massive victory is a vote for change.

FOR INDIA TODAY, the result was a sort of vindication. Our opinion poll correctly indicated that the Congress(I) would win by a landslide and secure the largest share of votes in its history. The forecast said the party would get 366 seats but also hinted at a still higher figure when it said: "The poll contains some indications that the Congress(I) might even win more than 366 seats. With its allies, the party could command over 400 seats in the Lok Sabha."

When this was published, it was blasphemy to mention any figure of over 300 in politically "well-informed" circles. And once the poll was published, INDIA TODAY was, predictably, the target of a campaign of vilification. Money was supposed to have changed hand. The foreign hand was seen to be at work. Even after the results were announced, we were accused of having influenced the election with our forecast.

Flattering though it may be, we have to confess that in spite of our large readership we cannot claim any such fame. There is no indication of how opinion polls influence voting behaviour. Madhavrao Scindia, who we had predicted would roundly defeat Atal Behari Vajpayee, bemoaned: "When your poll came out, half my party workers sat back because they said it was a foregone conclusion." And there was poetic justice in the fact that certain opposition politicians who derided the poll as "Congress(I)-manipulated" later sought a meeting with our pollsters to try and understand what hit them.

INDIA TODAY published a Lok Sabha election forecast, as it did in 1980, because of its commitment to scientific methodology. Election forecasts are not infallible devices, they suggest how things might turn out. The method we used is the best method we know though we are quite aware that had we been totally wrong it might have been the death of serious election forecasting in the country.

Since the cover story was scheduled to be on the winning party and that information could only be available on December 29, INDIA TODAY decided to work on the assumption that our forecast was correct and asked our correspondents to speak to people about what they would expect from the Congress(I) in its new term. The result is a story which not only deals with the outcome of the election, but the tasks that lie ahead for the new prime minister.

DCM LIMITED

Speech by Dr. Bharat Ram, Chairman, at the Annual General Meeting of the Company held on December 26, 1984 at New Delhi.

Dr. Bharat Ram

Ladies and Gentlemen,

It gives me great pleasure to welcome you to this annual general meeting of your company.

The 96th annual general meeting of your company is for me a very special occasion. Lala Charat Ram and I have been working all our lives in the DCM. The Board has rightly taken a decision that we would retire as Managing Directors from the end of March, 1985 making way for the younger generation. The Board has decided that Bansi Dhar be appointed as the Chairman and Senior Managing Director and Vinay Bharat-Ram as the Managing Director from April, 1985 onwards.

I will be addressing you for the last time as Chairman. Being a man of sentiment, I cannot help recalling the joy and toil that Lala Charat Ram and I have shared in steering the affairs of this company for more than four decades. The sixties was a period when we initiated major diversification of this company from textiles and sugar into fertilisers and tyre cord. The seventies was a period when our emphasis shifted towards building a new generation of managers, who could bring both stability and growth to the company. Achieving such a balance between stability and growth, I believe, is the perpetual challenge before top management. Some have handled it better than others, and those who have handled it better have taken their corporations to new heights. In this respect, I believe that DCM on the whole has been eminently successful. Despite the fact that it has been weighed down by an ageing textile industry, it has succeeded in spawning new ventures with growth potential for the future. Having made these general remarks, I would like to underscore the central theme of my speech, which I shall call the 'management of transition'.

Management of Transition

It gives me great pleasure in informing you that Bansi Dhar will be taking over as Chairman and Senior Managing Director and Vinay Bharat-Ram as Managing Director of this company from Lala Charat Ram and myself on our retirement in March, 1985. I would like to take you in confidence by saying that your present top management had prepared for this transition well in advance by exposing both Bansi Dhar and Vinay Bharat-Ram to various areas of responsibility within and outside the company. The result is that they will be taking over as a team of seasoned and experienced business leaders. I have full faith in them, and am sure you will extend to them the same support and co-operation as Lala Charat Ram and I have received from you.

Tasks Ahead

At any point of time in the history of an enterprise there always remains some unfinished business despite the harbingers of hope and confidence. As I have been saying for the last two or three years, the textile industry continues to pass through a crisis. Mills continue to be closing down. Unfortunately, we also have had to close down one of our Mills. While our Hindon River Mills, which is a modern Mill, is doing well, I do not know what will happen to the other two old Mills.

One does not close down a Mill unless circumstances make it absolutely unavoidable. Under these circumstances sometimes, it is financial prudence on the part of management to take this unpleasant step. Whether we actually may have to close any of our old units will be for the new management to decide. However, if this step is necessary, it would be with a view to put up a new and modern textile Mill by utilising the real estate on which the old Mill is located for commercial purposes. There is every reason to believe that such a programme of property development and re-location of the textile facilities will be possible.

A Valuable Legacy

The major factor which has given stability to the company in its difficult years is the continued good performance of the sugar, fertilisers and chemicals divisions. They have remained a model of managerial efficiency, and I am confident that they will prove to be pillars of strength in the years to come. On the side of growth in the direction of new technologies, as I had stated last year, DCM's thrust towards modern technology began in the late sixties. It was spurred on by the benefits derived from DCM's association with Shri Ram Institute for Industrial Research. Consequently, the company is now involved in the development and introduction of new technology in the areas of high polymers, irradiation technology, sugar manufacturing technology, bio-technologies, as well as the development of fire retardant fibres, etc.

The computer division is now well established with a research and development programme, which has enabled the export of software, production of Indian language computers, micro processor-based controls for energy saving and a whole range of mini and micro computers. DCM's automotive foundry at Ropar, in spite of some setbacks on account of an unfortunate political situation, is now poised for supplying sophisticated castings to the new DCM Toyota commercial vehicles project with the help of valuable expertise from Japan.

On the human side, our management training schemes deserve special mention. No company can preserve its vitality without an orderly programme of management development. DCM's tradition of inducting groups of bright young people at different levels of management into the company are only too well-known. It is important to note that these programmes are updated from time to time, with the result that our training schemes have the finest reputation in the country. It is not surprising therefore that many of the men, who joined us as trainees more than a decade ago, now occupy senior positions of responsibility.

Likewise, Lala Shri Ram's labour philosophy with its representation of a Labour Director on the Board of the company has become legendary. It is our belief that the company's concern, extends beyond the statutory eight-hour working day of the employee. Consequently, the creation of a suitable social as well as educational environment for his children is a matter of company concern. As a result, DCM has done its best to contribute towards housing, schooling, cultural events and sports, which culminate in an annual meet, representing all units of the company.

Perspectives for the Future

These are valuable legacies on which a company can build a bright future. They are far more durable than buildings and machines, and if understood in the right spirit can be a company's most valuable asset. They refer to the human dimension which is not easy to put down on a balance sheet, and yet it is this human dimension which in the final analysis marks the character and true worth of a corporation. I have full faith that the new management will build on this legacy.

The National Scene

It is ironic that while I speak of the management transition, this very concept applies with equal relevance to the nation. India has recently witnessed one of the grimmest tragedies in the assassination of Mrs. Indira Gandhi. This catastrophe could have easily thrown India into a whirlpool of uncertainty. However, contrary to the prophesies of doom, this did not happen, and we saw one of the smoothest transfers of political power. That the leadership of the country has fallen on such young shoulders, though inconceivable in the eyes of some, in my opinion, is in tune with the laws of nature. In this ancient land of ours, we sometimes find it difficult to believe that India is a young nation with more than half its population below the age of 30. It is possible therefore that the agonies and aspirations of such a young nation will be better understood by a leadership, which is closer to it in its own age profile, than by those who are well past middle age. Furthermore, a youthful leadership is required to cope with the compulsions of a fast changing world. These compulsions demand swift and unorthodox solutions for newly emerging problems, in areas like pollution, security and terrorism. They also require swift responses to opportunities and challenges posed by fast changing technology.

Some echoes of the political philosophy of the new leadership are already in evidence. A courageous confrontation with corruption, a commitment to efficiency and a focus on national integration have done wonders to raise the morale of those, who had doubts about the future of our society.

I have in the past been reviewing the economy of the country in my speech. But this time, I would only say that while we have achieved a moderate growth rate of 5 per cent in the past, I have every hope that the new leadership will make appropriate changes in the industrial, fiscal and monetary policies to increase the growth rate to a much higher figure which this country is capable of achieving.

To conclude, I look forward with great hope and optimism to the future. The transition of responsibility in our company has come at a fortuitous time when the country itself is about to embark on new initiatives. I therefore stand before you with the satisfaction of having devoted the best years of my life to a company of which we can justly be proud.

Before I close, I would like to thank all our workers and staff for the exemplary manner in which they have worked throughout the year.

Note: This does not purport to be a record of the proceedings of the annual general meeting.

BHOPAL'S TRAGEDY

The single picture "A caring hand brushes dirt..." in the Bhopal cover story "City of Death" (December 31) sums up the tragedy of the people of Bhopal in a way no words could.

Ramasamy Raja Nagar,
Tamil Nadu — S.N. RAMA RAJU

■ Now that huge amounts are being claimed as compensation for the victims it is the duty of the Union Government to ensure that all funds granted by the courts reach the actual victims instead of being siphoned off by middlemen.

MR CLEAN

Your cover story "Rajiv Gandhi: A Cautious Beginning" (December 15) is a sincere endeavour to cover up his inefficiency which is evident from his association with people like Arun Singh, Arun Nehru, R.K. Dhawan and the like. Before attributing "Mr Efficient" to Rajiv Gandhi you should have verified whether he has at least preserved the "Mr Clean" image till this day. Had you done that the statement "Mr Clean through a complex chemistry of power and circumstance, was fast turning Mr Efficient" would not have found place in the cover story. Not all Indians have forgotten Rajiv Gandhi's recent words and deeds. To mention a few, he found the recent coup d'etat in Andhra Pradesh valid, assured legal support to A.R. Antulay, and headed the demented NSUI conference at Nagpur.

Trivandrum — P. VIJAYA CHANDRAN

■ Rajiv Gandhi need not follow the old tactics which have stopped paying dividends. He has asked the people to choose between Bharat Desam and Telugu Desam. Who told him that the Telugu people want a separate state? N.T. Rama Rao has always emphasised the unity of Bharat Desam of which Telugu Desam wants to remain an integral part. Rajiv has also made several reckless statements, including the accusation that the Opposition helped destabilisation and violence and created conditions which led to the assassination of Indira Gandhi. In fact when army action was taken in Punjab the opposition parties supported it, Morarji Desai even said that it should have been taken earlier.

Hyderabad — LAXMI NARAYAN TERALA

■ At a time when more than half the people of India do not even have one meal a day, and the number of people below the poverty line is increasing by at least 3.7 million a year, Rajiv in his election speech says that people are demanding airports. He may not be able to feed the crores of beggars in the country, but he should not insult their self-respect in this fashion. The ruling party and the Opposition are the two sides of the same coin. Having no socio- economic programme to change the present system of exploitation the leaders of the parliamentary parties are resorting to all sorts of such political gimmicks. It is time people built a movement to establish a 'genuine democracy'.

Orissa — ABIR PADHY convenor, PUDR

HEINOUS MATRICIDE

Your investigation "The Assassination: Unravelling the Threads" (December 15) covers all aspects except one. Why have the five head priests not excommunicated Beant Singh (posthumously) and Satwant Singh? They excommunicated President Zail Singh and Santa Singh. Are these people worse than Beant and Satwant, who are guilty of heinous matricide leading to major tragedy for several thousand innocents?

Lucknow — LT COL S.K. MUSHRAN (RETD)

■ Indira Gandhi's assassination has revealed another unfortunate aspect of our national character, viz the tendency to deify a person after his/her death beyond all norms of reason. The past few weeks have seen Indira Gandhi placed on the same pedestal as Mahatma Gandhi, Joan of Arc, and for good measure, Jesus Christ and Lord Krishna.

An objective assessment of Indira Gandhi and her impact on India is sorely overdue. Those who draw a parallel between the two assassinations—that of Mahatma Gandhi and Indira Gandhi—are perhaps more emotional than rational. The Mahatma was assassinated for preaching love and compassion between two different communities while Mrs Gandhi was eliminated by the very cult of violence which she encouraged.

Bahrain — J. RAVI

BORED PISTOL

In your report "Envoy's Death" (December 15) while it is said that four 9mm bullets were recovered from the car in which Percy Norris was shot, I fail to understand how a .32 semi-automatic pistol could have been used. 9mm is otherwise referred to as .38 and in no way can a .32 cartridge be fired from a 9mm bore pistol/revolver.

New Delhi — SUEZ AKRAM

The error is regretted. —Editor

DOWN THE CORRIDOR

In your article "Punjab Crisis: Is There a Way Out?" (May 15) you have stated that "the transfer of Abohar and Fazilka to Haryana under the decade-old award given by Mrs Gandhi will involve the creation of 55 km corridor through Punjab linking these areas with Haryana which is hardly a practical proposition." In fact, the length of this corridor which is to be provided through the territory of village Kandu Khera is approximately 8 km and this can easily be dispensed with if this territory is transferred to Haryana to provide contiguity of Abohar-Fazilka Hindi-speaking areas with the Haryana.

The population of this village is overwhelmingly Hindi-speaking and in fact this village was a part of Fazilka until 1956 when it was transferred to Muktsar tehsil on the eve of the decision taken by the Punjab Government for dividing the state into Hindi and Punjabi-speaking regions. This decision was then taken by leaders of Punjab in order to disrupt the contiguity of the tehsil of Fazilka with the tehsil of Sirsa which is a part of Haryana. It was precisely on account of this lack of contiguity disrupted by the transfer of this village to Muktsar tehsil in 1956 that the Shah Commission could not include Fazilka in Haryana. In view of these facts it would be reasonable to transfer Kandu Khera to Fazilka. Since Abohar-Fazilka are predominatly Hindi-speaking they should be transferred to Haryana

The Dangers of Arrogance

PRIME Minister Rajiv Gandhi was right when he said that the massive mandate for the Congress(I) last week was a vote for a better future. In the days and months ahead, there will be many interpretations of the result, of the lunge rather than the swing towards the ruling party and the humiliating decimation of the opposition parties. But in essence, there is no mystery in what the Indian voter in his collective wisdom has done. He has given a clear signal that he is for an India that is independent, secure, unified and prospering, uncluttered with dissension, freed from the threat of fragmentation, governed by an uncorrupt, clean, effective and efficient government. And he has unambiguously given Rajiv Gandhi the strength and opportunity to deliver this changed future.

The ruling party deserves the accolades that have poured in with its impressive victory. There is justification for the euphoria. But if it allows this to go to its head, it will be letting down the voter who has given it this unparalleled plurality. It is well that the new prime minister struck a cautionary note in his first public utterances on the election result, emphasising the enormous responsibility that the election had now imposed on him and his party. Such restraint in the wake of such overwhelming success augurs well. For power can easily breed arrogance, and arrogance can distort the party's perception of the electorate's mandate. And that is a sure formula for failure. It cannot be stated too strongly or too often that every election is ultimately the victory of the electorate, that the result irrevocably reflects what the electorate—and not any political party—wants done.

POWER CAN EASILY BREED ARROGANCE, AND ARROGANCE CAN DISTORT THE PARTY'S PERCEPTION OF THE ELECTORATE'S MANDATE AND THAT IS A SURE FORMULA FOR FAILURE.

The Congress(I) and its youthful leader should be sobered in this hour of triumph by the thought that the massive mandate is an investment of hope in that better future, and that there can be no alibis if the hope is belied. There is no longer any parliamentary opposition worth the name, none certainly that can be offered up as an excuse for failure. The Congress(I)'s own foe is itself, and if it does not deliver, it will have only itself to blame.

Fortunately, the party has no reason to feel insecure. It must, consequently, resist any temptation to use its brute majority to steamroll hasty changes in the Constitution, or tinker with the idea of a presidential system of government, or resort to the premature dismissal of state governments. Such a step would be self-defeating in the long run. The election results contain few surprises, but they do show that the Rajiv Gandhi whirlwind has abated at the Banihal Pass in Jammu & Kashmir, and on the ramparts of the Telugu Desam fortress in Andhra Pradesh. One reason is that both Farooq Abdullah and N. T. Rama Rao are charismatic leaders. Another is that in their own ways, they stand for the aspirations of their people. But a third reason is that their electorate has obviously not forgotten the Congress(I) assaults on them in the last one year. The clean sweep by the Abdullah National Conference in the Kashmir valley is a powerful repudiation of the Congress(I)-supported regime of Chief Minister G.M. Shah whose son, Muzzaffar, was roundly defeated. And the Telugu Desam's impressive tally of 28 of Andhra Pradesh's 41 seats to which elections were held is a strong thumbs-down signal on last August's crude and eventually unsuccessful attempt to dislodge Rama Rao.

The absence of a credible Opposition in Parliament will also provide temptation to convert that institution, which is so central to a strong democracy, into a rubber stamp at precisely the time when it is necessary to strengthen institutions such as parliament, the judiciary and the executive. The absence of an effective Opposition is deplorable because it is necessary to remember that at least half the electorate did not vote for the Congress(I). This does not diminish the election victory or tarnish the mandate. What it does mean is that in spite of the lack of effective opposition, a gift of the parliamentary system's method of converting votes into seats, there is no less of a need to govern by consensus. Ineffective and unsuccessful it might be, disloyal the Opposition is not. And it would be pertinent to remember Disraeli's prophetic words: "No government can be long secure without a formidable opposition."

India's own recent past tells us that large majorities have in themselves never ensured the success of governments. This was true in 1971 and 1980 as much as in 1977, when each election swept in regimes with strong majorities only to see them falter in a couple of years. The pattern can and must be broken. It will be if Rajiv sees his massive mandate not as an end in itself but as a starting point for the bigger struggle that lies ahead. There are enough solutions available even to the most intractable problems. There is enough talent and goodwill to find others where none exists.

What is needed is a clear-sighted will to act, to plumb for what is right and see it through. If power remains concentrated in the hands of a coterie around the prime minister—a coterie made up of an all-powerful secretariat and advisors who seek to control access to him—he will lack the flexibility and flow of information he needs to make up his mind. But if he bends his efforts to strengthening the Cabinet and the bureaucracy, gives his ministers at the Centre and in the states the authority and means to get on with their jobs and holds them responsible, if he keeps himself open to ideas from the outside and deliberately sets out to build a consensus, then he will have an historic opportunity to give this country the decisive push towards modernity that it desperately needs, and to endow it with a reformed polity. It won't be easy, but that is why he has been given this historic mandate.

"If synthetics are our business, silk is our pleasure.

For centuries, silk was the fabric for the queens. Now, many centuries later, silk is the queen of all fabrics. There is no spot on earth where silk is not coveted, cherished–nor imitated.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Eight years ago, Garden ventured to break new ground in the manufacture of luxury fabrics – making pure silks to international standards.

Getting away from the slubby unevenness that gave Indian silk its particular ethnic character, Garden–Vareli adopted the Pura Seta know-how of Italian silk experts.

Highly controlled yarn selection ensures an evenness not seen before. Through a technique of removing sericin or the natural gum present in silk yarn, our silks acquire a softness and crease-resistance unknown before.

The silk saree has been transformed. "Too smooth, like synthetics," women said at first. The fact is, there isn't anything "too smooth for silk." The smoother, the superior.

Schooled in synthetics as we are, silk remains our ultimate challenge."

CONGRESS(I) A HISTORIC

THIS was the eye of the storm. Betraying none of the excitement of an electoral tornado all around, Rajiv Gandhi sat quietly in Puma sneakers, light-coloured slacks and a dark green sweater with leather shoulder patches. Munching a toasted sandwich, the prime minister took a few congratulatory telephone calls, baited Haryana Chief Minister Bhajan Lal for not delivering 11 seats out of 10, and seemed mildly embarrassed when a visitor said this was his personal victory, bigger and better than anything his mother or grandfather had ever achieved. "What can I say," he demurred.

The words were to come later, appropriate for each occasion, but almost banal nevertheless. At a victory rally the morning after, he spoke of the responsibility thrust on him and the party, and of projecting a new future. At the meeting of the Congress(I) Parliamentary Party two days later, when he was unanimously elected its leader, he said the party's electoral victory was the result of the effort put in by grassroots workers, and that this was a fitting way to begin the party's centenary year. That first day, there had at least been the air of a relaxed man savouring an expected and welcome victory. Now he was once again a bland inheritor, showing no signs of just having touched a nation's deepest chords to bring out the most overwhelming response of support in eight general elections.

In his campaign speeches he had forecast that "There will be no Opposition after the election." With outrageous forecast becoming sobering fact and unprecedented political achievement, the Opposition lay completely buried under an avalanche of votes. But Rajiv Gandhi could only say on one public occasion after another: "What is there for me to say." Words were finally superfluous.

There were few of them at the business-like 20-minute session of the Parliamentary Party. The sideshows seemed more of a giveaway than the loud shouts of 'no' when Buta Singh asked whether any candidates were being proposed other than Rajiv Gandhi: Kamal Nath eagerly offering his seat to Arun Singh as he walked by, Amitabh Bachchan staring unseeingly ahead in collected calm, moving just once to gently tap the desktop in acclamation.

BY THAT evening, it was time for action, and the first gentle let-down. Perhaps there was not enough new talent at hand, but the new Cabinet had too many old faces, and at least one of the new ones harked back to a shoddy past: Bansi Lal. There was also the unwelcome hangover of his mother's habit of leaving key portfolios vacant, and of leaving portfolios dangling in somebody's temporary charge. The new blood was largely at the level of Ministers of State: Arun Nehru, K.R. Narayanan, K. Natwar Singh, Madhavrao Scindia. Quite apart from the torch not being fully handed to a new generation, there was also the sloppy sight of ministers-designate being called out from the assembled gathering in Rashtrapati Bhavan's chandeliered Ashoka Hall to be made to sit with those due to be sworn in.

The only change of genuine significance was the welcome abolition of the post of deputy minister, while all three new Cabinet inductees—K.C. Pant, Abdul Ghafoor and Vishwanath Pratap Singh—can be considered 'clean'. Few can also question the dropping of the boorish and unpalatable A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chowdhury, or of the ineffective Sheila Kaul, though Pranab Mukherjee's noticeable absence smacked more of internal power struggles than balanced judgement of his abilities as a minister. Also significant was the de-linking of Personnel and Administrative Reforms from the Home Ministry and the enormous concentration of power in the prime minister's hands: 17 portfolios in all. Finally, there was the unbalanced geographical character of the Cabinet: the 14 Cabinet ministers come from eight states. Of the 17 MP's from Haryana and Delhi, four find a place in the Cabinet, but of the 71 MP's from the south, only two are in the Cabinet—both from Karnataka. The east too has only two Cabinet ministers out of around 90 MP's.

On the plus side, the new incumbents had been intelligently slotted: Bansi Lal could bring some of his drive for efficiency to bear on the railways without wrecking too many things around him. Arun Nehru would be less of a controversial political stormtrooper and more of a high voltage junior minister in an important portfolio. S.B. Chavan made sense as home minister, and so on down the line. But equally noteworthy was the prime minister's induction of two more parliamentary secretaries to assist him, and there now seemed little indication that he would try to reduce the role of the prime minister's secretariat and add substance to the form of Cabinet government.

On the whole, therefore, this was very much a mixed bag, and fell well short of marking a new beginning. There was continuity here quite definitely, not enough change, and a slight wilting of the hope that the new government would really be very different.

Whether change or continuity would mark the new government's functioning in the weeks and months ahead remains to be seen. But nothing would characterise the closing days of 1984 as much as the unprecedented and overwhelming nature of the election results. The Congress(I) won a staggering 80 per cent of the seats it contested, and along with its allies, it would occupy four of the five blocks of seats in the new Lok Sabha, leaving one last sliver of seats in the extreme left of the House for a decimated Opposition.

The figures would have been laughable if they had not been tinged with pathos: the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) contested 226 seats, and won two. The Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party (DMKP) contested 168 seats and won three. The Janata Party fought 207 seats and won 10. And the Congress(S) got four.

Between them, the four national opposition parties had 19 seats in the Lok Sabha, less than 5 per cent of what the Congress(I) now commanded. And the bulk of the Opposition now comprised two essentially regional parties: the unlikely creation of film actor, N. T. Rama Rao's Telugu Desam, and a newly humbled Communist Party of India-Marxist (CPI-M). Finally, close to two-thirds of the total opposition in the Lok Sabha would be from the two states, Andhra Pradesh and West Bengal.

If all this marked the creation of the most one-sided Parliament in the country's history, raising the spectre of near one-party democracy, the Congress(I) was not losing any sleep over the subject.

The AICC(I) headquarters on New Delhi's Akbar Road was illuminated for three days as the reports of successive triumphs poured in through 25 newly installed hotlines. And Rajiv Gandhi announced a two-month bonus for the entire AICC(I) staff.

IN THE states, the victories surprised even party leaders. Gujarat Chief Minister Madhavsinh Solanki's spirits had been anything but high a few hours before counting started, and he had confessed to senior party functionaries that he did not expect more than 18 seats out of the 26 in the state, compared to the 25 in the seventh Lok Sabha. The final tally of an absolutely unexpected 24 was therefore a handsome bonus.

In Calcutta, the crowds outside the counting centres howled like Romans at a circus every time the impassive bureaucratic voices announced that Congress(I) candidates were leading. At the centre where the Jadavpur constituency's votes were being counted, one drunk shouted: "Somnath Chatterjee's red dog has gone mad and bitten him." In her modest tin-roofed Kalighat residence, 27-year-old Mamata Banerjee, the Congress(I) candidate who had slain the Marxist giant, confessed: "I had never expected anything like this."

Across the country, the victory margins and the slaying of doughty opposition leaders by inconsequential Congress(I) candidates bore testimony to the size, sweep and power of the electoral tidal wave. Caste factors, for instance, proved irrelevant in numerous places. A Thakur

Congress(I) candidate in Hapur (western Uttar Pradesh) got 55 per cent of the vote although Thakurs account for no more than 2 per cent of the votes in the constituency. And Shyam Lal Yadav, fighting from the Brahmin-dominated Varanasi, won by a massive margin. One-fourth of the Congress(I) victors from Uttar Pradesh are Brahmins, who account for less than 12 per cent of the state's vote. Again, in Bihar, backward caste leader Karpoori Thakur was trounced, and the tribals ignored the Jharkhand appeal.

All too often, apparently weak Congress(I) candidates won over opposition stalwarts. In Tamil Nadu's Pudukottai, N. Sunderaraj got the Congress(I) ticket only after film star Sivaji Ganesan announced that he would walk out of the party unless his men got party tickets. Yet Sunderaraj trounced the Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam's (DMK) K. Veeriah by more than 2.64 lakh votes. And in Haryana's Sonepat constituency, the Congress (I) put up a nondescript lawyer against the Jat veteran Devi Lal, but Devi Lal lost.

It didn't seem to matter to the electorate whether the candidate was good or bad; if he was Congress(I) he won, if not he lost. So Lalit Maken won in south Delhi, and Era Sezhiyan lost to Vyjayanthimala in Tamil Nadu, despite humourist Cho Ramaswamy appealing to "vote Sezhiyan to the Lok Sabha and Vyjayanthimala to the dance sabha".

Even ruling party dissension failed to come in the way of the overwhelming sweep. In Bihar, Thakur leader Satyendra Narain Sinha, who joined the Congress(I) shortly before Mrs Gandhi's assassination, complained bitterly during the campaign that a state Bhumihar minister was sabotaging the candidature of his wife, Kishori Sinha, in the Vaishali constituency, but she nevertheless won handsomely. And in Haryana, Chief Minister Bhajan Lal was working undisguisedly for the defeat of three party candidates in Bhiwani, Karnal and Rohtak, but all three romped home successful.

Almost inevitably, then, the electoral sweep carried everything before it. In Bengal, the CPI(M) was routed in the urban and industrial centres, populated by the advance guard of the revolution. In Madhya Pradesh, long considered a BJP bastion and where the party had won a series of parliamentary and assembly by-elections apart from polls held for local bodies, the party was routed and failed to get a single seat, including that of party President Atal Behari Vajpayee. In Karnataka, ruled by a Janata government, the Congress(I) swept 24 of the 28 seats, leaving the vitriolic George Fernandes sputtering in his own vitriol. In Delhi, the BJP got barely 28 per cent of the vote. Five years ago, the party had lost all but one seat in the capital, but at least salvaged its prestige and standing as a national party by getting 43 per cent of the vote. This time, however, there were few votes and no seats.

The trend was national. Jagjivan Ram, winner seven times from the reserved constituency of Sasaram in Bihar, barely scraped through by 1,300 votes, but he now knew that he belonged to India's political past like others who had been demolished in earlier elections: S.K. Patil, Atulya Ghosh, K. Kamaraj. And Hemvati Nandan Bahuguna, who only weeks earlier had hoped to inherit the DMKP mantle, now discovered there was no mantle to inherit and that he himself was no inheritor. Finally there was Chandra Shekhar. In the summer heat of 1983, he had sought an image larger than a politician's with his walkathon from south to north, but he now found himself lost in the dusty dirt-tracks of Ballia in a discontented winter of 1984.

Gone also were the rebels, the Sivajis and Tippu Sultans trying to stand in the way of Delhi's arm reaching outward, former satraps trying to stake out their own territory. An Antulay in Maharashtra's Kulaba, a Siddhartha Shankar Ray in Darjeeling, a Karan Singh in Jammu, a Lt.Gen S.K. Sinha in Patna.

FEW OF the vanquished had foreseen such humiliation. On December 23, a day before the first polling day, 83-year-old Charan Singh told guests assembled at his house for his birthday that he expected his party's candidates to do "extremely well". But by 2 p.m. on December 28, he had retreated into his bedroom and asked his aides not to send in any more ticker copy from the teleprinter in the house. When newsmen trooped in by late evening, age and frustration were writ large on his face. "Shoot all politicians, you, me, everyone," he declared in a fit of rage before talking of rigging, money power and "beimani" (dishonesty) and lapsing into incoherence. The news of his own victory at Baghpat brought little cheer, and the frustrated former prime minister withdrew under a heap of blankets and almost by way of a soliloquy mumbled on about various possibilities. The news from Gwalior seemed the final blow. "My god, even Atalji has lost. What will happen to this country?"

A stone's throw from the DMKP office, the BJP office had been bustling with activity in the morning. Party office-bearers basked in the winter sun on wicker chairs in the lawn, and the optimism remained undimmed despite the first reports of reverses. Delhi unit chief Kedar Nath Sahni talked of how the womenfolk in the houses of hardcore BJP supporters had flouted the 'directives' of their menfolk to vote for the Congress(I) this time. And party treasurer Shanti Bhushan, in a display of machismo, threatened to sue every winning Congress(I) candidate for spending beyond the prescribed limit on their campaigns.

But things changed quickly after 12.30, when Vajpayee called from Gwalior to say that he was trailing by a margin that seemed unassailable. Nobody spoke for a long time after that.

Vajpayee had in fact been anticipating defeat. "I knew what was coming the moment I went around the polling booths in Gwalior," he said. "Normally you would expect some voters to react with hostility, and others to be friendly. But in this case most people seemed indifferent. That rang danger bells. It was obvious to me that these were people who had made up their minds to vote for the maharajah." And indeed, Vajpayee got only 28.65 per cent of the votes.

But the BJP president recovered his cheer quickly, bantering with newspaper photographers about wanting to put his picture along with other losers. Janata Party President Chandra Shekhar, another opposition party chief to be vanquished, also recovered quickly from the first shock, and sat composed on his lawn with a transistor, receiving with a resigned smile the details of the rout. "Oh, they are winning everything. Absolutely everything. There will be no Opposition, only Congressmen. And what kind of men."

Predictably, Menaka Gandhi was

"There was mass rigging and booth capturing," Menaka alleged. But her words carried little conviction, and few failed to notice the tear-stains on her face.

In Calcutta, the West Bengal chief minister had already had time to absorb the shocks when he drove in his white Toyota to the Communist Party of India (Marxist) headquarters on Calcutta's Alimuddin Street. Striding in with characteristic vigour, Basu was immediately closeted with party leaders in a conference room, and then left for his office in Writers Building in the heart of the city's business district. Internal party debates centred for a while on whether the Left Front Government in Bengal should resign, but the decision was to soldier on despite the fact that the Congress(I) got only a couple of lakh votes fewer than the CPI(M).

The only cheerful Opposition camp in the country was in Andhra Pradesh, where the Telugu Desam and its allies had captured 34 of the 40 seats for which elections had been held. Chief Minister N.T.Rama Rao, now heading a party which would be the largest opposition group in the Lok Sabha, hailed the Andhra results, congratulated Rajiv Gandhi and within a day was already talking of fresh initiatives for achieving opposition unity.

In another southern citadel of the Opposition, Karhataka chief minister Ramakrishna Hegde surveyed the shattered ruins of his party but breathed defiance for a day ("Why should I resign?") before submitting his two-year-old government's resignation and recommending the dissolution of the state assembly. A week before polling, Hegde had joked that even if the Opposition got two of the 28 seats in the state it would be a 100 per cent improvement over the lone seat it had in the seventh Lok Sabha, but as things turned out even four seats and a 300 per cent improvement was not enough to save him.

IF THE times seemed grim for the Opposition, and the future bleak, the decimated parties' leaders reacted in confused haste. H.N. Bahuguna, without even waiting for the announcement of the Allahabad result, sought an emergency meeting to form a single opposition party. Vajpayee reacted indignantly, telling Bahuguna: "What is the use talking of a single party when we could not even make an arrangement before the poll." Bhairon Singh Shekhawat, former Rajasthan chief minister and BJP chief in the state, was practical as ever: "How do we face the assembly elections in three months?" he asked plaintively, but no one around him was in a mood to reply.

There was a general disapproval of Hegde's decision to quit, and a number of opposition leaders called him to suggest that he should have dissolved the Assembly without resigning. The Centre would then have been faced with the dilemma of whether to dismiss him along with the G.M. Shah Government in Jammu & Kashmir (whose party got routed by Farooq Abdullah's National Conference).

There was also some instant talk of allowing younger opposition leaders to take the reins, and Charan Singh himself talked of stepping aside. But this seemed more out of disgust and confusion than out of any reasoned plan to project a new leadership. Meanwhile, the question in the Janata Party was whether Chandra Shekhar would be able to retain his tenuous hold on the party. But one thing seemed possible from the initial manoeuvres made immediately after: even if moves were initiated to form a united opposition party, the two ageing stalwarts Charan Singh and Jagjivan Ram would be allowed no prominent role in Parliament. Ironically, they were the only two prominent opposition party presidents to retain their seats in the Lok Sabha.

While most parties waited for their national executives to meet in early January and take stock, two or three things were already clear. Though many opposition party members felt the electorate would have to be offered new, younger leaders with less of a past, the party bosses themselves felt disinclined to step down. And in the case of the DMKP, it had little choice but to continue to rely on Charan Singh as its principal vote-getter. Nevertheless, the parties would have to try and build their strength and leaders from the state level upwards, strategies would have to be worked out in the interim in order to prevent a rout in the coming Assembly polls in nearly a dozen states, and efforts would have to be made to prevent an exodus of party workers and the lower level functionaries.

Only those leaders with a personal charismatic following, people who could count on their supporters to vote for them no matter what the occasion or issue, could survive the wave.

It was a sympathy vote, said Chandra Shekhar. Indira Gandhi dead is more powerful than Indira Gandhi alive, said the CPI(M). But both missed the essential point that the vote was also a positive one for a combination of change and continuity. It was certainly a vote to hang together when the unity issue was raised, and a vote against a fractious Opposition led by discredited men who, despite more than a year of parleying, presented as disunited a front as ever when the elections came around.

There was also the largely ignored factor of economic satisfaction. Prices had been under moderate control for more than a year, the inflation rate being no more than 8 per cent. Farmers across the country were happy after three successive record harvests. The middle class was preoccupied with spending on a steadily expanding range of consumer goods, and the power position had improved sufficiently for a farmer in western Uttar Pradesh to say: "Earlier we used to get power for four hours in a day. Now we get electricity for eight hours." Industrial growth had been good for two years running, and everyone connected with trade, exports and imports, and with running businesses has been happy with the government's progressive opening up of policy and the easing of controls. The net result was that there was almost no economic dissatisfaction that the Opposition could capitalise on, no anger or frustration to tap. Unlike 1980, onion prices were under control.

THERE were other factors too. Most opposition leaders are now convinced that the Congress(I) landslide was caused partly by a massive wave of support from Hindus in northern India, especially Hindu women who identified with Rajiv as son and fresh-faced brother. There was also the switch of support from large numbers of Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS) cadres. Nana Deshmukh had himself endorsed Rajiv Gandhi as prime minister in November, and numerous RSS workers said they wanted to show the country that it was the majority community that elected the Government. Among other things, this pointed to an enormous erosion of support for the BJP, which will therefore have to do the most anxious soul-searching among all the opposition parties.

Among yet other reasons for the one-sided election result was the absence of any protest vote. Mrs Gandhi had built up a substantial opposition to herself, of people who distrusted her authoritarian tendencies, who saw danger in the manner she weakened the country's institutions, who disliked her efforts at perpetuating dynastic rule. But with Rajiv, it was different. As a well-known Bengali novelist Sunil Ganguly said: "I always found it difficult to accept the idea that only the members of the Nehru family are capable of ruling the country. But when Mrs Gandhi was assassinated, and with the country's integrity in question, I could think of no one but Rajiv as the prime minister."

Many opposition leaders also realised that their election campaign had been too defensive. Even on the Punjab issue, on which the Government had so much to answer for, the Opposition had been put on the defensive. At the start of the campaign, a suggestion had been made that the Congress-Bhindranwale relationship should be driven home by sticking up posters showing Zail Singh, then home minister, sitting with Bhindranwale. The move was dropped so as not to violate the dignity of the presidency. Only in the final days of the campaign, with Rajiv Gandhi hammering away at the Anandpur Sahib Resolution and the Janata treatment of Jagjit Singh Chauhan, making the Opposition look as though they were being parties to national disintegration, did the response come in the form of a few Zail

Singh-Bhindranwale pictures. But by then it was too late to wrest the initiative.

It is doubtful, however, whether even an aggressive opposition campaign would have got very far. For this election showed for the first time that Rajiv Gandhi has an ability credited so far to only Ronald Reagan: the ability to walk away from a botch-up, politically unharmed. Like Reagan Rajiv too has a Teflon coating: nothing sticks to him. He was instrumental in mounting a wasteful Asiad extravaganza, but the poor still have faith in him. He had a hand in the undemocratic dismissal of the Jammu & Kashmir and Andhra Pradesh governments, but he is still seen as a politician without a burdensome past. He described Bhindranwale as a religious leader only weeks before Operation Bluestar, but the populace pays little heed to the possibility of political immaturity. He gets a natural gas pipeline to be extended 200 kilometres east at a cost of over Rs 200 crore so that a fertiliser plant can be located in his constituency, but he is still called Mr Clean. And he clearly relies more on a personal coterie of friends and aides than on the general party and government machinery, but he is still expected to usher in a political culture that is different from that bred by either his mother or brother.

And no matter how much mud the Opposition throws at him, nothing sticks. It is as though, in the same way that Americans wished a grandfather image on to Reagan, Indians have willed their hopes of change and improvement on a fresh face and made Rajiv their favourite son. There is a political strength here that was not revealed before polling day, but which now is all too evident.

BUT SWEEPING mandates and large majorities are deceptive as sources of political security, especially when serious and difficult issues wait to be dealt with. And Rajiv Gandhi would do well to remember that in 1971 Mrs Gandhi was at the peak of her political popularity, riding the 'Garibi Hatao' wave and cresting a still higher one following the Bangladesh war. But in less than two years of that, she was sliding into political crisis, desperation and ignominy.

The Janata government similarly was given a powerful mandate in 1977, only to fritter it away through vicious infighting. Mrs Gandhi came back in 1980 once again with a two-thirds majority, but she quickly found herself on the down-escalator. And until her assassination, many of her party stalwarts were slee-

What the people say

Atma Ram

"I HAVE no prejudice against Rajiv as such. But I object to this continuation of dynastic rule. This is a flouting of the fundamental principle of democracy," says Atma Ram, brother of the late Guru Dutt and producer of such films as Qaid, Umang and Shikar. Adds Gaddar, a revolutionary folk music composer and singer of Hyderabad who canvassed for a boycott of the elections: "Rajiv Gandhi will be no different from his predecessors. If anything he will make India even more vulnerable to being used as the playground for the games of the superpowers."

Ganguly

BUT FOR the vast majority of the electorate, Rajiv's family and party connections bode only good for the future. "Only a lion's cub can be born in a lion's den," says farmer Bare Lal of Madhya Pradesh. "He is Mrs Gandhi's son and belongs to the family that has ruled us for long. That is enough for me." Indeed, most of the electorate seems to be looking not at Rajiv's past but at the future, and with hope. As well-known Bengali novelist Sunil Ganguly says: "After all, we have no proof that Rajiv is useless either."

Alladin

THAT Rajiv's youth and relative political inexperience did not discourage the voter was brought out again and again by the millions who exercised their franchise. Says Bilkiz Alladin, author-journalist of Hyderabad: "Four years in politics and three weeks of tough electioneering may not be enough to develop perspective. But he is a great symbol of hope." Ahmedabad television producer Himangshu says: "Since Rajiv is young, I expect him to take a fresh approach to problems and implementation of policies." Adds Ashok Chatterjee, director of the National Institute of Design (NID) in Ahmedabad: "Being young he may as well call his own tune".

Chatterjee

BUT ALONG with all hope for the future, there are some regrets. Chatterjee voiced the feelings of many when he said: "What distresses me is that though this election held out promises for change, the same candidates have been fielded again and the new ones do not signify any changes. A great chance to bring decency into our political culture has been lost." Kumudini Lakhia, the well-known dancer adds: "Everyone calls Rajiv Mr Clean. But will he be able to resist temptations? It is not enough just to keep away from dirt, he has to get rid of it."

Helblikar

SURESH Helblikar, a film director of Bangalore, says: "I don't think he knows India well. He still has to learn a lot. He looks like he wants to purge the party and he might make a good prime minister, but he must develop his mother's approach of having science in her mind and tradition in her heart." Ranjit Gupta, the former inspector-general of police of Calcutta, however, felt that: "Rajiv may run into trouble here because politics cannot be cleaned up totally anywhere. The modern Machiavelli would advise him to go slow on this."

Gupta

BUT GUPTA is pleased from his professional point of view by Rajiv's priorities, especially his resolve to strengthen law and order, fight corruption, and build up the defences of the country against external dangers. "This is the first time an incoming prime minister has said he wants to strengthen law and order. Everybody has talked about freedom and liberty without understanding that these spring from the maintenance of order through the enforcement of the law," says the former policeman. As the new prime minister steers India into the future, an informed, concerned and reponsible citizenry will be watching him, and will not hesitate to voice its opinion.

Clearly, large majorities do not make for good government, and mandates are useless if there is no sense of mission. Many of the country's primary institutions have taken a great deal of battering in recent years, and it should now be one of the prime minister's most important tasks to breathe new strength into them.

Parliament is a test case. Balram Jakhar, speaker of the seventh Lok Sabha, put it pithily when he told an interviewer that "You need two wheels for a cart to move, the ruling party and the Opposition." With one wheel now much smaller than the other, the responsibility for keeping Parliament on course falls more heavily than otherwise on the prime minister. There is the danger, after all, that if the Opposition feels it is not getting a voice in Parliament, it will be tempted to become irresponsible and seek extra-parliamentary methods. A.B. Vajpayee was voicing a genuine fear when he said: "May be it is just as well that I lost. What can a few leaders do in Parliament? Any time you try to raise your voice, the others will shout you down."

The large majority also carries with it certain dangers: of the party's nerve-centre becoming insensitive to impulses from the extremities, of leaders at the Centre thinking they can ride roughshod over state chief ministers and the chiefs of Pradesh Congress(I) Committees. Former Bihar chief minister Jagannath Mishra was trying to say something of this sort when he told INDIA TODAY: "This kind of a result has created a sense of fear in me too. To have such a massive majority for a party in a democracy is also dangerous. We must have some opposition leaders in the House, or outside they may create more nuisance. And you know, it is always difficult to sustain a storm. I am worried, really upset."

If not many others spoke as frankly as Mishra, many certainly shared his anxieties, especially because the election campaign had seen a clear tendency to downplay the role of chief ministers and state-level leaders. Would the party centre now arrogate too much power to itself, encouraged by the fact that Rajiv was the real vote-getter on whom everybody else depended, and would Rajiv surround himself with a coterie who cut him off from everybody else, so that he lost touch with earthy reality? While a number of party leaders spoke quietly of their growing worries, there also arose the question of groupism and dissidence in such a large parliamentary party.

In Madhya Pradesh, for instance, Chief Minister Arjun Singh has ensured that between 25 and 30 of the 39 Congressmen who won from his state are his supporters. V.C. Shukla could get only a couple of his men in, and P.C. Sethi's base has been eroded completely. In Vidha, Pratap Bhanu Sharma's candidature was opposed by most factions, but Arjun Singh saw him through. And in several villages in Vidisha, dissident Congressmen asked villagers to vote "according to their conscience". Such rivalries and differences are not likely to be easily forgotten, and the over-sized party could quickly become as fractious and uncontrollable as ever.

Also, with Arun Nehru taken away from party functioning, and two other general secretaries also inducted into the council of ministers, the key question was who would now run the party. There was speculation that Rajiv Gandhi would himself take an active interest in party affairs. There would be no room any more for kingmakers. Whether this plan would work, and whether the prime minister would find the time for everything remained to be seen.

IF THE unprecedented majority for the Congress(I) presented some manner of problems for the party, the Opposition could also find room for hope despite the enveloping gloom. For one thing, they still commanded a sizeable percentage of the national vote, the Congress(I) had got just under 50 per cent of the total votes cast, and so the support out in the countryside was far more than the pitiful representation in the Lok Sabha suggested. This dichotomy was particularly evident in a state like Madhya Pradesh, where the Congress(I) swept all 39 seats but could not prevent the BJP from attracting a creditable per cent of the vote. Similarly, in Maharashtra, the Congress(I) got 43 of the 48 seats, compared to 39 in the last Lok Sabha, but actually got a smaller percentage of the vote than in 1980: 51.2 per cent against 52.8 per cent. There was a noticeable drop in support in the Vidarbha region, where Vasant Sathe barely scraped through, and across the state half a dozen seats could have gone to the Opposition with a marginal swing in the vote. The picture was not quite so hopeful everywhere, and in the two opposition strongholds of Andhra Pradesh and West Bengal the opposition victories were by small or reduced margins. Nevertheless, a base still existed on which a chastened opposition could build a future.

Some pointers on how to go about this task were available from a study of who had been able to withstand the Congress(I) wave. One simple answer emerged: those with a personal charismatic following, people who could count on their supporters to vote for them no matter what the time or the issue or the circumstance. A Farooq Abdullah in Kashmir, an N.T. Rama Rao in Andhra Pradesh, people like Charan Singh and Jagjivan in their constituencies (which neither visited for electioneering), a survivor like Sharad Pawar (who won his seat in Maharashtra's Congress-leaning sugar belt), and in a different context the Tamil Nadu Chief Minister M.G. Ramachandran. The importance of strong state-level leadership thus takes on a new importance, as does the fact of strong regional identities that will not be bludgeoned into submission by Delhi.

But regional appeal can offer no way out for the national parties. The Janata will have to ask itself why it has repeatedly failed to emerge as a broad-based party with sufficient strength, the Congress(S) must ponder over its marginal existence, the BJP will go through some serious soul-searching after the desertion by RSS cadres, the Left parties must seek a way out of by-water eddies into the mainstream, and the DMKP must face a crisis presented by the fact that a rural-oriented party in a predominantly rural country can neither find sufficient acceptance nor throw up new leaders. The party's base and credibility seem on the decline, the leaders of farmer agitations in Maharashtra, Tamil Nadu and Karnataka will have no truck with the party, and its entire existence seems to be explained as no more than an extension of Charan Singh's political personality and ambition. But futures are not built around octogenarian leaders, and the DMKP can have little to look forward to if it fails in very short order to establish itself as an independent rural party undependent on Charan Singh.

BHAWAN SINGH

IF THE Opposition's task was thus cut out for it, the Congress(I) seemed anxious not to sit on its hands. Plans were already being drawn up last fortnight to ask each party member of the Lok Sabha to draw up a constituency plan of action including specific projects. Each MP will then have to submit quarterly reports on the progress in implementation, so that a clear record of work for each constituency can be claimed when next going to the electorate for votes.

But the biggest test of all was for Rajiv Gandhi. Pitchforked into power, he would deliver and solve the serious problems that lie ahead. Rajiv said often enough that the new government would get to grips with the Punjab problem right after the election. Whether this means making a unilateral declaration of what the Government is prepared to concede on Chandigarh and the river waters and then get on with healing the emotional rifts created by Operation Bluestar or releasing the Akalis from jail and restarting negotiations, he will have to show he is capable of statesmanship.

He has also said often enough that his government will be clean and efficient, committed to rapid economic progress. To give this substance, he will need to give concrete shape to the Congress(I)'s manifesto promises, move decisively against corruption and black money by reducing bureaucratic intervention in the economy and reforming the financing of political parties, open the economy more decisively to the best in technology from abroad, and allow the country's abundant innovative, entrepreneurial and managerial talent a freer hand to contribute to national growth. And, he will have to start quickly, showing the first signs of change in the next budget so that the tone of his administration is set.

A young man who was now prime minister in his own right, a battered opposition seeking a way out of the darkness, question marks over the quality of the prime minister's first major announcement, all this and more formed the mosaic of the post-election scene as the country entered a new year and a new era. But the much more notable fact was the manner in which history had just been written by the nearly 200 million people who went to their polling booths in the most remarkable democratic exercise the world has seen.

ELECTION ANALYSIS

An Unprecedented Result

TO ANALYSE the results of the election, INDIA TODAY asked Prannoy Roy to examine the results of each state in detail. The analysis uses detailed polling figures as well as more complete returns from the INDIA TODAY opinion poll published in the issue of December 31, 1984. The data was still incomplete as this issue went to press, with results of 488 seats fully tabulated and another 20 to come.

The election result shows a remarkable swing towards the Congress(I) giving it a nation-wide 52 per cent share in the seats it contested and just under 50 per cent if all seats are included. The swing towards the ruling party is 7 per cent over the already high share of votes it cornered in the 1980 election. The Index of Opposition unity, which varies between zero and 100—a higher score indicating higher unity, was 75, higher than 65 in 1980 but well below its 1977 peak of 90.

The 7 per cent swing gave the Congress(I) all the seats it contested in several states including Delhi, Gujarat, Haryana, Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan, Tamil Nadu and Kerala, and a higher swing in these states obviously would have made no difference to its seats. In other states, such as Bihar, Uttar Pradesh, Orissa, Karnataka and Maharashtra, a larger swing would have made little difference, yielding no more than an additional 18 seats. But a better share of the votes in Andhra Pradesh and West Bengal would have made a substantial gain for the Congress(I).

On the other hand, the disunity of the Opposition had two effects. One was a pure arithmetical division of the opposition vote which helped the Congress(I) but by not as much as usual since in a very large proportion of the seats it contested, the ruling party took more than half the vote. The other effect, the image of a disunited opposition, was more telling and it added considerably to the swing in favour of the Congress(I).

But this is insufficient to explain the magnitude of the swing. Several other factors appear to have caused this. Among them:

■ Was there a Hindu backlash? Unfortunately, this simple hypothesis is not enough to explain the entire swing because a very large proportion of Muslims and other minorities appear to have voted in favour of the Congress(I). The opinion poll showed that 63 per cent of Muslims would vote for the ruling party, and this was borne out by the large number of Muslim-dominated constituencies returning Congress(I) candidates.

■ The issue of unity. The Congress(I) slogan of unity seems to have evoked a nation-wide response, couched as it was in the campaign in terms of the situation in Punjab. This was indicated in the opinion poll and by the fact that there was a higher than usual turnout in the election, which reflected the genuine anxiety of the voter and brought out sections of the electorate that usually would not have cast their vote.

■ The urban vote. Compared with his country cousin, the urban voter was more stridently in favour of the Congress(I). The opinion poll showed the ruling party's vote to be 4 per cent higher in urban areas. This was reflected in the election results in many states. In West Bengal, for example, the major erosion of the CPI(M) vote was in the urban constituencies.

A detailed look at the results from the states reveals the magnitude of the Congress(I) victory: it got more than 50 per cent of the vote in 10 states and Delhi; in Kerala and Tamil Nadu where it fought with alliance partners it received more than 50 per cent of the vote in the seats it contested; only in Andhra Pradesh and West Bengal was the tide stemmed.

A swing away from the Congress(I) and a more united opposition deprived the party of 35 of the 41 seats it won in 1980. The Congress(I), however, fared better than it did in the 1983 assembly elections —recording a swing in its favour since then of 9 per cent. Corruption was a major election issue, and the Congress(I) didn't help itself by putting up the same old candidates. A poor campaign strategy counterposed Telugu Desam against Bharat Desam instead of portraying the two as complementary, suggesting that regional autonomy would be meaningless without securing national unity.

Opposition disunity was a major cause of the enormous gains for the Congress(I)— the IOU in 1984 was only slightly higher than in 1980 resulting in the ruling party winning an unprecedented 48 seats. Respondents in the Bihar opinion poll had overwhelmingly stated 'unity' as the main poll issue in the forecast, and 67.3 per cent of the Muslims said they would vote for the Congress(I).

The party polled 53.3 per cent of the vote compared to 54.9 per cent in 1980. The IOU has traditionally been high in the state, and this time with seat adjustments in all seats except Baroda, it remained at a high level of 86, marginally above the 1980 level. In spite of the negative swing, the Congress(I) should be pleased with its performance in the state because it has retrieved a lot of lost ground that was indicated in its poor performance in the recent by-elections in the state.

The state saw the defeat of one of the more controversial rebels against the ruling party, A.R. Antulay, who lost from Kulaba to a strong Peasants and Workers Party candidate though he did manage to eat into Congress votes in the constituency.

In spite of a huge improvement in the IOU to 82 from 57 in 1980, the Congress(I) was able to win all but one constituency, Kendrapara, from where Janata Party leader Biju Patnaik won narrowly. The ruling party saw a small, 1.4 per cent swing towards it and despite effective seat adjustment by the Opposition leading to a high IOU of 82, the Congress(I) was able to do well because its vote has traditionally been high. It received 57.4 per cent of the popular vote cast.

The Congress(I)'s sweep of Rajasthan was due largely to a 6 per cent swing in its favour to give it 52.7 per cent of the vote, the highest it has received since 1957. The IOU was slightly better at 66 compared with 60 in 1980 but with the high Congress(I) vote percentage, the Opposition was able to make little impact. The BJP obtained 23.76 per cent of the vote and the DMKP 11.2 per cent. In 1980, Janata Party drew 31 per cent of the vote and the Janata(S) 12 per cent.

The AIADMK-Congress(I) alliance proved to be much more effective than the DMK-Congress(I) alliance in 1980. There was a swing of 5.2 per cent towards the 1984 alliance giving the Congress(I) 40.4 per cent of the vote in the whole state and averaging over 60 per cent in the seats that it contested. The IOU has been traditionally high in this state with each contest virtually a straight fight between two alliances. The AIADMK received 18.8 per cent of the total vote and 61 per cent in the seats that it contested. The DMK trailed 25.3 per cent of the state vote, averaging less than 40 per cent in the seats that it contested.

A dramatic swing of 14.9 per cent to the Congress(I) saw the party take 51.4 per cent of the vote in the 77 constituencies (of a total of 85) from which detailed results were available. The Muslims, a major electoral force in the state, were solidly behind the Congress(I) with the opinion poll showing that 68 per cent of them would vote for it. The DMKP, which expected to do well, received 22 per cent of the vote and won only 2 seats. The BJP, with 6.5 per cent of the popular vote, won no seats. Rajiv on the campaign trail: indefatigable

THE CAMPAIGN

A Winning Strategy

THE ENDURING image is that of a white kurta-pyjama-clad figure, a shawl draped over one shoulder and around his waist, rushing up the steps of an election podium to face yet another audience in yet another constituency. It is to this man, decried by some as a political novice, that the landslide victory of the Congress(I) belongs, to the image he projected, the words he spoke, the strategy he adopted, the powerful empathy that he attracted.

Rajiv Gandhi's election strategy has paid off like nobody else's in the past. From the word go, from that now-distant election meeting in Bulandshahr on December 1 which kicked off the prime minister's campaign, the strategic mix was clear: a mixture of hard work and aggressive campaigning designed to cut the ground from under the Opposition's feet and project the ruling party as the only one capable of serving the country's needs.

To push this message across effectively, Rajiv outdistanced all other campaigners, past or present. In 25 days he covered almost 50,000 km by plane, helicopter and car, addressing 250 scheduled public meetings in as many constituencies, reaching out in person to more than 20 million people. Punishing as it was, the campaign hardly left a crease on his face. True, his voice would be a little hoarse in the evening, but each audience would see him a renewed campaigner, hair brushed in place and kurta spotless white, talking as if it were the first meeting of the day.

In the process, he demolished the myth of the political novice, of a soft pilot-turned-politician being manipulated by weightier personalities. There was nothing soft in his style or his campaign which sometimes bordered on the intemperate, which saw him hurling accusations after accusation against the Opposition and moving on before they had time to recover.

But more than that, it was the message that went home, a message that changed in expression as the campaign wore on but at heart remained the same: that India's unity and integrity were being threatened and only the Congress Party would be able to keep the country from breaking up.

It is difficult to say if the electorate was responding to the letter of this message or the spirit behind it—but there is no doubt that by giving the ruling party more than 50 per cent of the vote, the electorate endorsed the strategy.

To begin with, the prime minister's campaign focussed strongly on Mrs Gandhi's assassination, on the inimical forces that masterminded it and how they hoped that India would disintegrate as a result. The appeal led to a new phrase in the political lexicon: sympathy wave. But then midway through the campaign Rajiv changed his plank and sharpened his message to focus on Punjab, on the Anandpur Sahib Resolution, recognising that here was an issue which went straight to the gut in most parts of the country. The technique was a no-holds-barred offensive against the Opposition, on how it had allegedly colluded with what Rajiv described as the forces of destabilisation. "How is it that three members of the Opposition visited the Golden Temple shortly before Operation Bluestar and came back to say there were no extremists, no arms?", he thundered in a Bangalore meeting. "The Opposition must clarify, what is its attitude towards the Anandpur Sahib Resolution, and they must answer these questions before the 24th (polling day) because after that day you won't see them again." Glossing over the Congress(I)'s own earlier connection with Bhindranwale, whom it supported in elections to the Shiromani Gurudwara Prabandhak Committee against the Akali Dal, he focussed on Khalistan protagonist Jagjit Singh Chauhan's prolonged visit to India during Janata rule, citing that as the starting point of the Punjab agitation.

Sharp jibes about the fractured Opposition—"how can parties who can't agree on the sharing of tickets hope to come together to run the country" or "if they can't provide an effective Opposition, how can they form a government"—went home swiftly, and soon Rajiv was putting the onus of proving their fidelity on the Opposition leaders. He revived old charges against George Fernandes, that he had received funds for his trade union activities from West Germany and Japan, which Fernandes has cleared up earlier. In a bid to wean the Muslim's from the Janata Party, he brought up former Israeli defence minister Moshe Dayan's secret visit to India during the Janata period. Often, Rajiv would equate the secessionist movement in Punjab with Jammu & Kashmir and Assam, both of which are entirely different problems, to strengthen his allegations against the Opposition charging Farooq Abdullah, for instance, of doing nothing when Pakistani flags were raised at a cricket match in Srinagar—ignoring the fact that this is a not infrequent occurrence and hasn't been unknown since G.M.Shah's Congress(I)-supported regime took over. And, Rajiv was misled by a report which alleged that an American study discussing the likely effect of the death of Mrs Gandhi was published just weeks before the assassination when in fact the book had been on the shelves—and with the Indian Embassy in Washington—for several months.

SADLY enough for them, the stalwarts of the Opposition fell prey to the campaign. With Rajiv stealing their thunder, all that they could get into the national media were denials and protestations which, however valid they may have been, could hardly project a positive impression. Indeed, some of the Opposition campaigns sparkled with wit, and many contenders argued their cases well. But they made few ripples and the overall impression left behind was of an Opposition fragmented and ineffective, put on the defensive.

This merely compounded the effect of yet another master stroke from the Congress(I), pitting glamorous vote-catchers against Opposition stalwarts. Atal Behari Vajpayee didn't learn till an hour before nominations closed that he would be fighting Madhavrao Scindia in Gwalior—leaving him no time to file a second nomination. Amitabh Bachchan tied down Hemwati Nandan Bahuguna in Allahabad while his fellow members of the celluloid world, Sunil Dutt and Vyjanthimala Bali accounted for Ram Jethmalani and Era Sezhiyan. The main result of this was, of course, that with their own seats in difficulty, the Opposition's best campaigners couldn't afford time to go out vote getting in other constituencies.

Not that the Opposition parties covered themselves with glory in their efforts to unite or come to some sort of understanding. Divided among themselves, they were a less than impressive sight, quarrelling over leadership, over seat sharing, over candidates. Mrs Gandhi's death removed whatever focal point remained to their unity efforts. After that they were adrift—and the voter saw right through their protestation that they would usher in an era of coalitions. The voter, obviously wiser after the experience of 1979 when the Janata coalition broke under its own contradictions, wanted none of that. A common remark in the countryside was: "They don't have enough candidates to form a government—why should I waste my vote on them?"

Nor did the Opposition have anywhere near the reach and the resources of the Congress(I). The party's publicity and campaign organisers—men like MP's Arun Nehru, Vishwajit Singh Ahluwalia and Sreekant Verma, advertising executives like Arun Nanda and Romi Chopra, and close aide Satish Sharma—divided the campaign in two phases. To remind the electorate that Mrs Gandhi gave her life in the cause of national unity, they coined the slogan: "Indiraji ki antim ichcha, boond boond se desh ki raksha"

CAMPAIGN MANAGERS

Good Logistics

THE CONGRESS(I) campaign had a good dose of the much-talked-about management culture which is permeating the party. The troika responsible for the nuts and bolts of this successful campaign were comparatively new entrants into the political arena: Arun Nehru, the All India Congress(I) Committee (AICC-I) general secretary, Vishwajit Singh Ahluwalia, a Doon School-educated Rajya Sabha member from Maharashtra, and Captain Satish Sharma, a former Indian Airlines colleague of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi. These trusted aides were handpicked specially by Rajiv himself to ensure that the most important ingredients for the massive election strategy like funds, publicity and transport were in safe hands.

Since it was going to be one of the most expensive elections, Nehru was chosen to handle funds alongwith the AICC(I)'s treasurer Sita Ram Kesari. Deviating from the past practice of authorising the various Pradesh Congress Committees (PCC-I) and the District Congress Committees (DCC-I) Nehru prohibited all Congressmen from collecting money. It was the AICC(I) which itself raised funds and distributed them to all the PCC(I) chiefs who in turn gave it to each candidate. Nehru's primary responsibility was to see that none of the party's candidates was starved for funds, ensuring at the same time that the expenses were within reasonable limits.

According to AICC(I) sources, a limit of Rs 2 lakh for each contestant was imposed by Nehru himself when some candidates started demanding over Rs 5 lakh in the name of fighting Opposition heavyweights. While he conceded few requests from candidates like Jagan Nath Chaudhury, who defeated Janata Party President Chandra Shekhar, and Mahesh Sharma who lost to Chaudhury Charan Singh, he compensated others with allocating them extra publicity material. Though the ruling party's vessel of funds was overflowing, Nehru, by making himself inaccessible, ensured that he was relatively free of direct pressure from the candidates for additional financial support. Instead, he deputed Kesari, who was available to all the PCC(I) chiefs through newly-installed 25 hot lines, to entertain requests and put them up to him for final clearance. But Nehru made it a rule that the AICC(I) would not deal with the candidates directly. A notice board stating that "the candidates should contact the PCC(I)'s for election material" was put up at Arun Nehru's office door. Said Kesari: "In elections each candidate wants enough money when he feels shaky. But we knew our limits and handled each request carefully."

But the trickiest job of distributing election material to 494 candidates was left to Ahluwalia. He was not only asked to get over two crore posters printed in a short period of seven days but also had to ensure that they reached the constituencies in time. In addition he was directed to procure over 50,000 video and audio cassettes for recording Mrs Gandhi's and Rajiv's speeches, along with other publicity material. Ahluwalia was also allocated a specific financial budget in which he was expected to provide over a dozen publicity items to all the candidates in six days.

Ahluwalia ran into major hurdles right from the beginning. He was initially pressurised into printing all the posters in firms where a few AICC(I) employees and some senior MP's had a (Mrs Gandhi's final wish, every drop of blood for the country's security). Some 2.5 million posters and 100,000 cloth banners bearing this message flooded the countryside. Verma said: "I must confess that we ourselves were surprised by the success of the first phase of our campaign." The party used cassettes, posters, banners to send the country's 350 million voters this message.

The second phase of the campaign focussed on Rajiv, projecting him as the only person capable of holding the country together and leading it in these difficult and troubled times. The new prime minister was depicted as a man willing to take quick and even unpopular decisions: the Delhi riots were cooled in 72 hours, corrupt politicians had been denied tickets, some 100 sitting MP's had been retired. Above all, he was projected as a clean politician determined to rule effectively and efficiently. "We were pretty sure that the sympathy wave would not last and we wanted people to accept Rajiv Gandhi as the most acceptable claimant of the prime ministership."

To help achieve this aim, a 30-minute video cassette was circulated widely, showing an interview with Mrs Gandhi in which she spoke about Rajiv and snatches of film from the new prime minister's first fortnight in office. In the second phase of the campaign, posters of Rajiv dominated the publicity effort: some 80 per cent of the 15 million posters and pamphlets circulated carried either his picture or excerpts from his speeches.

None of this came cheap: according to estimates, some Rs 9 crore was spent on newspaper advertisements— some 15 large ads in each of more than 250 newspapers and periodicals, and another Rs 16 crore on posters and pamphlets, stickers and other election gimmicks.

OBVIOUSLY as the result shows, the spending was well worth it. But it is also true that for the first time, the Congress(I) was less than profligate in handing out funds to its candidates. In an unusual show of fiscal discipline, the party allotted a mere Rs 2 lakh per candidate and provided the average aspirant with three vehicles in addition to about one lakh posters, 5,000 flags, 500 banners and several thousand audio cassettes of songs and speeches.

The campaigns, particularly Rajiv's, clearly touched a vital nerve in the electorate. INDIA TODAY correspondents touring several different parts of the country attributed the Rajiv whirlwind to five factors. They were:

- Abhorrence at the assassination of Mrs Gandhi, expressed by showing solidarity with her son. As Chandrika Prasad of Patna put it: "The people have taught the killers of Mrs Gandhi a lesson. She said that the last drop of her blood would serve the nation, and after her death, every Indian has risen to save the nation."
- A genuine desire to give Rajiv, who is uncluttered with ideological baggage or a dubious political past, a chance.
- A powerful and spontaneous response to his campaigns, platform manner and appeal, his style and message.
- A realisation that the Opposition was in no position to form a government.
- A widespread perception that the economy has done well in the last few years.

None of this would have gone home, however, if the voter didn't know his mind. For the fact is that the Indian voter has a very clear idea of where his interests lie, what kind of candidates or party or programme he wants, whom he will respond to. If the campaign was unprecedented, so was the voter's choice. And it was ultimately his decisive vote that opened the new frontier for Rajiv Gandhi.

vested interest. But to the chagrin of many, Ahluwalia, instead, invited over a dozen advertising agencies and signed an agreement for printing posters according to his schedule. During earlier elections, AICC(I) received numerous complaints about fewer posters being supplied than ordered because it was humanly impossible to count all of them. Ahluwalia overcame this problem by ordering that each bag of 10,000 posters be weighed before being sent off to party offices all over. Once the supply line for posters and other materials was opened, Ahluwalia even airlifted posters to far off places. Said he: "It was a question of reaching each constituency in time. And we found that it would be cheaper to airlift material than sending it by road and going through all those hassles of check-posts and other barriers."

Arun Nehru

V.S. Ahluwalia

Satish Sharma

Occupying Nehru's room in the AICC(I) office, Ahluwalia was coordinating the distribution of the entire publicity material with the help of two retired senior army officials and a dozen especially recruited hands. In fact, it was perhaps for the first time that the Congress(I)'s election material was conspicuous by its display in all the constituencies. Said Jagdish Tytler who retained his Sadar Bazar seat in Delhi with a huge margin: "Never before have we had such a well-organised election campaign in which each one of the candidates got what he actually required to win an election."

While funds and publicity material were taken care of, the prime minister chose Sharma for organising a well coordinated transport system for campaigning, which included road and air transport. As a former Indian Airlines pilot and vice-president of Aero Club of India, Sharma was adequately equipped for the job. And he had already some experience in this regard: last year he handled the transport arrangements for the Jammu & Kashmir assembly elections.

And when Rajiv sounded Sharma for the Lok Sabha election arrangements he collected over 3,000 jeeps from neighbouring Haryana, Rajasthan and even from Gujarat. Once Sharma was able to organise three to four jeeps for each candidate, he made a list of over 20 helicopters and six aeroplanes which could be made available for campaigning by the PCC(I) chiefs and the state chief ministers.

While Rajiv Gandhi used Indian Air Force's aeroplanes and helicopters for campaigning, all the 17-odd chief ministers and PCC(I) bosses pressed into service over a dozen helicopters, a majority of them organised by Sharma. Said a Congress(I) MP from Madhya Pradesh: "The party needed both air and ground attack ability in order to defeat our political enemies and Sharma provided a grand combination of both. And you see the results. The party has won hands down everywhere and the entire Opposition is biting dust."

PSEPHOLOGY

Method in the Madness

OPINION polls have been a feature of several of the parliamentary elections but it was not till the 1980 and 1984 polls that psephology, the scientific study of the election process, came into its own. Most opinion polls used a sampling technique to predict the percentage of votes likely to be won by various parties. Helpful in some ways, this failed to provide a suitable basis for the forecasting of seats likely to be won. The Indian multi-party parliamentary system is based on the winner being the "first past the post", and the proportion of seats won is always higher than the proportion of votes cast (see table). Election forecasts therefore remained inadequate since the pollsters lacked the means to translate votes polled into seats won.

Enter two young economists, Prannoy Roy and Ashok Lahiri. After a computer study of the previous general elections, Lahiri and Roy found that the country could be divided into "homogenous swing zones" which cut across state borders and, indeed, constituency frontiers in which the swing of votes was similar, that for some reason the electorate in these zones tended to show swings of a uniform size in the same direction election after election.

They were thus able to devise a technique in which the electorate could be sampled in a representative constituency in each swing zone to show how the vote was likely to swing in the entire zone. Certain pitfalls, they found, had to be avoided. The presence of any mitigating factors—like the constituencies of political heavyweights—had to be avoided since the objective was to assess a representative constituency. By adopting this method they were finally able to break the code that would enable them to translate votes into seats.

The technique was first applied to the 1980 election when INDIA TODAY commissioned a Bombay-based marketing organisation to carry out opinion polls in locations provided to them by Roy and Lahiri. The 1980 prediction pointed in the right direction: at a time when most political observers were anticipating a Congress(I) debacle, the INDIA TODAY forecast said the party would win 291 seats; the actual tally in the January round of elections was 353.

The same method was used to make the 1984 forecast. Between December 7 and 14, opinion polls were carried out in 35 representative constituencies by MARG Marketing and Research Group. Each constituency was covered in a representative manner, that is with the correct rural/urban and male/female samples. Some 8 to 10 locations were selected at random across the constituency and around 300 house-to-house interviews carried out in each constituency.

The findings were then fed into the computer model and the swing towards or away from the Congress(I) calculated. The swing in the representative constituency was applied on the 1980 results of all constituencies in the swing zone and the model then suggested whether or not the seat would remain with the party that held it in 1980 or not.

Those unfamiliar with sampling techniques wonder if it is fair to determine what a whole constituency will do on the basis of just 300 interviews. The fact is that if the sample is scientifically selected, the findings of the poll should, on the basis of the laws of probability, be within a plus-minus 5.7 per cent of the true result in 19 cases out of 20.

Last month, on the basis of 11,297 interviews carried out, the INDIA TODAY forecast yielded a much higher tally than those of other polls, just as it did in 1980. Yet the actual result was far higher than the 366 predicted. But the poll did contain indications that the seat tally might be higher than 366 and the forecast said quite clearly that "...the party could command over 400 seats in the next Lok Sabha".

It is well to remember that India is a vast country and that it is difficult to reach all parts of it quickly, especially where communications are poor. That coupled with deadline problems meant that the field work for the forecast had to be carried out over a week and completed 10 to 15 days before polling day, just as serious campaigning had begun. Thus, the poll was unable to take into account any late swings or the impact of the campaign itself, both in the 1980 and 1984 elections.

COMPUTERS

Chipping In

IF LAST fortnight's elections were a thumping victory for the Congress(I), they were something of a giant leap for computer buffs. Two manufacturers provided computer back-up to those interested in processing and analysing the vast amount of election-related data that was generated.

Computer analysis: new trends

International Computers Indian Manufacture (ICIM) provided a 101 computer to Prannoy Roy to analyse the 11,297 sample opinion poll carried out by MARG (Marketing and Research Group) on behalf of INDIA TODAY. ICIM computers were also used by Roy to develop his election forecasting model which predicted the Congress(I) landslide (INDIA TODAY, December 31, 1984).

DCM, the other entrant into this field, tied up with the United News of India (UNI) and the government's Press Information Bureau (PIB) to process the results as they poured in on a DCM-Tandy computer. This enabled the PIB and UNI to put out election results faster than during any other election and, what is more, put the information out in a convenient, easy-to-digest format. Says DCM's S.K. Maggu: "Computers have for all time to come changed the way that elections will be reported, analysed and understood."

Ailing MGR: remote control

TAMIL NADU

Fruitful Alliance

IT WAS a bad day for the political pundits. Even the staunchest AIADMK supporter had nursed the gut feeling that the fortunes of that party and the Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam (DMK) would be evenly matched in the Tamil Nadu assembly elections. The DMK President M. Karunanidhi had drawn unprecedented crowds during his election campaign. And the AIADMK was seriously handicapped by the absence of its glamorous and popular leader, M.G. Ramachandran, undergoing treatment in New York for kidney failure, paralysis, and speech impairment. Even over-cautious political commentators openly said that the state would be voting indecisively for the first time. Tamil Nadu had overwhelmingly voted for the Congress till 1967, and since then for either of the two Dravidian Kazhagams.

But the results of the assembly elections held last fortnight humbled the pundits and commentators beyond belief. The AIADMK, which contested in alliance with the Congress(I), got absolute majority on its own, winning 133 of the 234 assembly seats (of course, elections were held only for 232 seats: the poll was countermanded in two constituencies because of the death of an independent candidate). MGR's party emerged again in a position to form the government on its own accord—and that in spite of the fact that the party contested only 154 seats.

The Congress(I) also did exceedingly well, winning a staggering 62 of the 72 seats it contested. On the other hand the DMK—which was estimated to win anything between 80 to 100 seats—was almost totally wiped out with a measly tally of 20 seats. Observed K.S. Ramakrishnan in the Indian Express: "For Karunanidhi this time, his party's symbol (rising sun) could very well have been christened the 'setting sun'." Tamil Nadu had once again cast a decisive vote.

The mandate was unmistakable. And the margins made it amply clear whom the voters really wanted. Even if there was any rigging, it didn't make any difference to the outcome. MGR won by a big margin of 32,000 votes over his nearest Forward Bloc rival P.N. Vallarasu in the Andipatti constituency of Madurai district. In Athur in Madurai the former finance minister, V.R. Nedunchezhiyan—who was also deputising for MGR during his absence—trounced his nearest rival by a majority of 29,573 votes. With the lone exception of the former Adi Dravidar welfare minister M. Vijayasarathy, who lost to his DMK rival in Arakonam in north Arcot, all the former AIADMK ministers romped home with resounding majorities.

Surprisingly enough, even open infighting in the AIADMK in MGR's absence didn't affect the party's fortunes. The party's former propaganda secretary and high-profile Rajya Sabha MP Jayalalitha Jayaram undertook exhaustive whirlwind campaign tours, but conspicuously did not address any election meeting in the Madurai east constituency, where the former agriculture minister K. Kalimuthu was contesting. Kalimuthu nevertheless defeated his nearest rival, P.M. Kumar of the CPI by a margin of over 6,000 votes. Former industries minister C. Ponnaiyan, who contested from Tiruchengode in Salem district, was noticeably absent from an election meeting that Jayalalitha addressed in the constituency. But Ponnaiyan too won by a margin of 19,222 votes against M.M Kandasamy of the DMK.

Normally, urban areas are considered DMK strongholds, while the AIADMK is reckoned more powerful in the rural ones. But this time round, except for Madras city, urban constituencies were just as unkind to the DMK as the rural areas. In Thanjavur town, traditionally a pocket of DMK influence, the seasoned P.S Thangamuthu of the DMK lost by 2,000 votes to Congress(I) candidate Dorai Krishnamurthy. In the thousand lights constituency of Madras city, Karunanidhi's son M.K. Stalin lost by 2,292 votes to the former dairy development minister K.A. Krishnaswamy.

AIADMK candidates were able to win by impressive margins even when they fought outside their native constituencies. Education Minister C. Aranganayakam—who had been elected to the assembly from the Coimbatore (west) constituency in the 1980 poll—was shifted this time to neighbouring Thondamuthur. But he won over his nearest CPI(M) rival V.K. Velliangiri by a huge margin of over 22,000 votes. The president of the All World MGR Fans Association, P. Musiriputhan, hails from Musiri in Tiruchi district, but this time he was given the Kulithalai ticket. He won nonetheless with a decisive margin of nearly 30,000 votes. Observed P. Nedumaran, the famous president of the Tamil Nadu Kamaraj Congress (which went to the polls in alliance with the DMK), and who himself lost his native stronghold Madurai (central) seat to the Congress(I): "The people of Tamil Nadu have not yet woken up from the stupor of sympathy for an ailing MGR and assassinated Mrs Gandhi."

But the election victory, however encouraging, has hardly solved the problems of the AIADMK, a one-man party surviving solely on the charisma of MGR. In fact the victory itself poses serious problems for the party. The American doctors who successfully performed a kidney transplant on MGR last fortnight, have advised him to stay on in New York for a few more weeks under medical supervision. Moreover, when and to what extent his speech faculty will improve remains uncertain. In the mean time, the party is so seriously riven by internal dissensions that there is no other consensus candidate to hold fort in MGR's absence.

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Among the aspirants for leadership in the party, there is Jayalalitha, whose stock went up immensely after she was recognised as the only effective crowd-puller in the AIADMK's election campaign. There is the former information minister R.M. Veerappan, MGR's ally for many years, who fired the first salvo in keeping the other contestants for party leadership at bay by issuing a statement that "there is no problem in the party electing MGR as its leader and the state governor inviting MGR to form the Government" And there is the shrewd former electricity minister S. Ramachandran, who was only too quick to jump into the fray with Veerappan. Ramachandran in fact went one step further and said that "MGR will be sworn in as chief minister in New York". Finally there is the least controversial candidate Nedunchezhiyan himself. So intense is the leadership struggle that even a prominent Congress(I) leader in the state remarked: "The AIADMK's eventual split is certain, only when is the question."

Little wonder, then, that senior party functionaries have—in a desperate effort to keep the party together—bought time by again formally electing MGR as leader, although leaving open the unprecedented legal question of how he can be sworn in as chief minister in New York in a constitutionally valid manner. According to S. Ramachandran: "There should be no problem in Governor S.L. Khurana flying to New York with the state chief secretary and swearing in MGR as chief minister there. I think there is absolutely no legal bar in swearing in a chief minister on foreign soil. Of course, we have to ascertain legal opinion."

Another former AIADMK minister, however, disagrees: "The governor's jurisdiction ceases once he steps out of the state." Legal opinion is also divided. Khurana refused to comment, but he is understood to have expressed his disinclination to go to New York when the members of the AIADMK Parliamentary Board called on him to officially inform him that MGR had been elected leader. But the Parliamentary Board is seeking legal opinion on this issue. Said Nedunchezhiyan: "We will find out what the law says and place all existing facts before the governor."

Jayalalitha (above) and Nedunchezhiyan: holding fort

There are other reasons as well for the AIADMK to not gloat over its election victory. In real terms, the party hasn't gained anything much in the elections. It had 130 seats in the dissolved assembly, so it has been able to add only three seats to that tally. It is the Congress(I) which has been the greatest beneficiary of this assembly poll. It had a strength of only 33 in the dissolved assembly (the 30 it had won in the previous elections, and three by defection), whereas it has won 62 seats now. In the constituencies that the Congress(I) candidates have won, on an average, they have secured 54 per cent of the total votes polled. AIADMK candidates, on the other hand, managed only 50 per cent. The Congress(I) contested 111 seats in the 1980 assembly poll in alliance with the DMK to win 30, whereas it contested only 72 seats this time to win 62.

The credit of scoring the highest victory margin this time goes to Congress(I) candidate S. Govindasamy, who won the Edapadi seat in Salem by a majority of 40,723 votes. Congress(I) candidates won by impressive margins even in constituencies which had been consistently returning AIADMK contestants. For instance, P. Sengottian won the Kapilarmalai seat in Salem by a margin of over 10,000 votes though C.V. Velappan of the AIADMK had been elected from the constituency in the three earlier elections. Virtually wiped out of the state in 1967, the Congress(I) seems to be regaining its foothold now.

"In fact the AIADMK won this time because of the Congress(I) and not the other way round," observed S.D. Somasundaram, former food minister in the AIADMK cabinet and president of the newly formed Namathu Kazhagam, all of whose candidates including Somasundaram himself lost their deposits. "For one thing, there is the traditional Congress vote bank. Then there is the intelligentsia which concluded that it doesn't benefit the state to have an opposition party in power here. And finally there are the large masses of illiterate people who wanted to vote the hand at the Centre and couldn't distinguish between the Assembly and the Parliament. After 1971 this is the first time that Lok Sabha and assembly polls were held on the same day in the state. And in 1971 also, like now, the mandate was identical for both Lok Sabha and assembly. It was only in 1977 and 1980, when the assembly and parliamentary polls were held on different dates in the state that the verdict of the people was different for the two."

It really seems therefore, as if MGR's party has taken a piggy-back ride on the Congress(I) in Tamil Nadu this time. As the TNCC(I) President M. Palaniyandi remarked: "The outcome of the elections as we see it, has been only a Congress(I) wave from Kashmir to Kanyakumari."

MUSHTAQ AHMED

Hegde announcing his resignation: strategic move

KARNATAKA

A Dignified Exit

AT 3.16 P.M. on December 29, a plainclothes policeman rushed to the dais where Karnataka Governor Ashok Nath Banerjee was presiding over the convocation ceremony of Dharwar University, 500 km from Bangalore, and handed the governor's aide a white envelope. Banerjee casually prised the envelope open and read the message without any surprise, for only 15 minutes earlier he had received a news agency flash about it. The message contained Chief Minister Ramakrishna Hegde's 348-word resignation letter, recommending immediate dissolution of the state Assembly following the ruling Janata Party and its allies' loss of all but four of the 28 Lok Sabha seats in Karnataka.

Except for the alacrity with which it was tendered, Hegde's resignation surprised no one. The previous morning the chief minister and his council of 33 ministers had met in the cabinet hall inside the imposing Vidhana Soudha in Bangalore as the results trickled in. The first report showed the Congress(I) leading in 25 of the 28 constituencies. Hegde was stunned and disappointed, but had not yet given up all hope of victory. As he said later, "I was hoping that the trend would change."

But by evening, as Hegde lay in bed with an excruciating backache and kept track of the results over his bedside telephone, the last flicker of hope was extinguished. The Congress(I) had established a clear lead in 24 of the 28 constituencies. Five of Hegde's six ministers who had stood for elections had been defeated, and doughty Janata Party General Secretary George Fernandes was losing by a margin of 40,000 votes in the Bangalore north constituency.

For Hegde the moment of truth had finally arrived. For two years he had run a government with a fragile majority, skilfully warding off sustained attacks by the Congress(I) to topple him by engineering defections in his ranks. He had proved that his coalition government could not only survive but work as well. For 20 days he had toured the state intensively, ignoring his ailing throat, in a bid to woo Karnataka's two crore electorate. In desperation he had wilfully put his government's performance to test in the Lok Sabha elections, telling the electorate that it would be a vote of confidence for him and his ministry.

Now that electorate had given its verdict and he had to act. "I am never confused during times of crisis. I have never met a blank wall," Hegde told INDIA TODAY later (see interview). But that night a stunned Hegde showed no signs of clear thinking. When a persistent newsman told him that former chief minister Gundu Rao had demanded his resignation, Hegde snapped back: "Why should I resign? Mr Rao does not understand the implications of the results. It is not as if I have lost the Assembly elections." A terse Hegde then left his cabinet colleagues in his drawing room where they sat watching the election broadcast on television, dismissed his security guard and walked down to his eldest daughter's house a short distance away.

Over a simple dinner of curds and rice, Hegde worked out his strategy. He was feeling the intense strain of running a ministry that was constantly under the threat of being toppled by defections. The Lok Sabha results would only intensify that threat. Twice before, governments have fallen in Karnataka after the Lok Sabha elections. In 1971 when Hegde was finance minister in Veerendra Patil's Congress(O) ministry, the government fell when they lost all the Lok Sabha seats to the Congress(R). There was a stampede of defections in the Congress(O). Then, in 1980 when the Congress(U) ministry headed by the late Devraj Urs was trounced in the polls, Urs resigned. Overnight 80 MLA's walked over to the Congress(I) and Gundu Rao formed his notorious government of defectors. Although there is no constitutional provision for the ruling party of a state to quit if it lost in the Lok Sabha poll, a precedent had been set.

History had repeated itself for Hegde —but with a difference. While in 1980 the Congress(I) was willing to form a government with the help of defections, this time round the new prime minister was unlikely to sully his "clean" image by telling his partymen to form a similar type of government. Hegde knew that none of his 94 MLA's would desert him immediately because there was no party they could beneficially join.

By the time Hegde finished his the first, dinner, he had worked out two options: not to resign but wait till the Central Government dismissed him and imposed President's rule as it did in 1977 when Urs headed the ministry. This would result in a tremendous wave of sympathy for him. But the danger there was that he could be ac-

RAMAKRISHNA HEGDE

"I am not demoralised"

AS SOON as Chief Minister Ramakrishna Hegde resigned and bid farewell to his bureaucrats in Vidhana Soudha, he dispensed with his official car. He told Correspondent RAJ CHENGAPPA to hop into his own car driven by his son, Bharat, and headed home where he got his official telephone disconnected and told his security staff to leave. Then in the drawing-room, with his family sitting around watching his resignation speech being telecast, a relaxed and smiling Hegde dropped his guard for an hour-long interview. Excerpts:

Q. You once said informally that to be in power was heady and intoxicating. How does it feel to be out of power?

A. I have a feeling of relief and freedom. A feeling of not being under any obligations. It is as if a weight is being lifted from my shoulders. I am disappointed but not demoralised.

Q. When did you first get an inkling that you were going to lose?

A. For the first time in Kanakapura (his home constituency) three days before the election, I had an insight. The crowd seemed to have come only as a courtesy.

Q. You were hoping to win 14 to 16 seats out of the 28. Why did you not win these?

A. Initially we thought the sympathy factor was not working and the response was good for us. But perhaps we aimed at too high a target. You know even if we won two seats it would have meant a 100 per cent increase in our strength because in 1980 we won only one seat.

Q. But why did you lose?

A. Very simple. It is not a vote against the performance of the state Government. People have hesitatingly given the Congress(I) support in the state. The Congress(I) has not gained but lost its base in the state. We have gained by a 10 per cent increase in votes while they have lost by 5 per cent.

Hegde: sense of relief

Q. Although you claim that it is not a vote against your performance, when you were campaigning you made your government's performance a key issue.

A. It was done deliberately to establish a closer relationship with the electorate. It was a tactic.

Q. But don't you think the strategy failed and as a result you were forced to resign although you were not constitutionally bound to?

A. Our strategy has paid because otherwise we would not even have won so much. Devraj Urs did not make his performance a campaign issue when his party contested. But he resigned when his party lost. So did Veerendra Patil. There is always the pressure of defection and also a moral responsibility to contend with.

Q. Why did you resign and recommend dissolution of the Assembly?

A. On moral grounds and to seek fresh mandate from the people. We were already under the severe strain running the Government with a fragile majority and to prevent the Congress (I) move to topple us by engineering defection. The poll verdict would only intensify this pressure and we didn't want to run after MLA's to keep our majority. This time we are going to ask the people to give us a clear mandate.

Q. What is going to be your strategy now?

A. I'll take it easy for a month and then work for the party again. We will have to win the assembly election and we will go to every village and ask the people to vote for us. I am sure they will respond.

Q. Since you are the party's star campaigner much depends on you. In fact there seems to be a personality cult growing around you here. Isn't this detrimental to your party?

A. I know this has been happening although I have been trying to tell my colleagues to avoid it. Our people believe in symbolism and I have become one of the symbols of the Janata Government in the state. This is Indian culture. But I prefer to delegate responsibility so that my colleagues would get full scope to prove their mettle.

Q. What lessons did you learn from this election?

A. Not to strain my vocal chords too much.

Before the chip, the information the ant is carrying had to be stored in a circuit board so large that a man couldn't even hold it!
The LSI chip is a thin sliver of silicon on which electronic circuits involving thousands of components are processed. It consumes less power, takes less space, works much better and faster.

If only the ant knew what it was walking away with! What relativity is to physics, that's what the chip is to electronics. It changes everything.

The large-scale integrated silicon chip is made from something as ordinary, as common place as sand. Yet, its implications are gigantic.

From the tiny video game to while away time at home to the launching of towering rockets into outer space, the digital watch strapped unnoticed on a wrist to ultra modern and super efficient telephone exchanges, it is the chip that's working its wonders. Silently.

In India, a company is engaged in the manufacture of a large number of these miracle chips. A company called Semiconductor Complex Ltd. Chips for digital electronic telephone exchanges, push button telephones, calculators, quartz watches and clocks, computers, industrial controls and instrumentation; made in collaboration with three international giants in the field.

cused of holding on to power and his MLA's may not stick with him. The other option was to recommend dissolution and resign as chief minister thereby putting the ball in the Congress(I)'s court. The governor had to either accept his recommendation or invite the Congress(I) to form a government, both of which would help the Janata politically.

HEGDE was keen on quitting immediately and the next morning he called a cabinet meeting to find out what his colleagues felt. But for a few, the rest of his cabinet was keen that Hegde should resign and recommend dissolution. But even as they were debating the issue news came of Rajiv Gandhi's press conference where he said that he was not going to dismiss the Karnataka Government and impose President's rule. That did it. The Cabinet than unanimously passed a resolution recommending dissolution of the state Assembly.

Hegde then sat down with his cabinet and law secretaries and wrote a long-winded resignation letter to Banerjee. In it, Hegde took pains to point out that his party had improved its performance as compared to the 1980 poll and that there was no need for him to really quit, because "the issues in the Lok Sabha elections are national and the performance of the local government may come for popular review only incidentally". According to Hegde, on "moral grounds" he felt it necessary "to seek a fresh mandate of the people in keeping with the best tradition of democracy". As Banerjee was away in Dharwar, the police teleprinter was used to transmit the message to him.

Hegde's move immediately put the Congress(I) on the defensive and exposed its lack of unity. The local party has such a paucity of credible leaders that ironically enough the star campaigner turned out to be none other than the discredited Gundu Rao. The Congress(I) campaign had never been so subdued, with the high command giving only Rs 2 lakh for each constituency and the candidates unwilling to spend more. The Congress(I) presence was hardly evident yet it won because as elsewhere in India, Mrs Gandhi's assassination and the threat to national unity had left a seemingly deep impact. It was like an unseen hand working for the Congress(I). As a member of the high command close to the prime minister put it: "We won in spite of the local leaders in the state."

The inherent weakness of the state Congress(I) party was exposed immediately after Hegde's resignation. With Banerjee away in Dharwar and the Congress(I) high command busy with the forming of the Central Government, there was no one to advise them on what course to adopt. The result was confusion confounded. While leader of the Opposition Veerappa Moily and state Congress(I) chief K.H. Patil were keen on forming a government, Gundu Rao, who knew what it meant to head a government of defectors, wanted the Assembly to be dissolved. Most of the new elected members of Parliament were keen on the Assembly being dissolved because defector MLA's hardly worked for their constituencies. After a day of haggling, the Congress(I) leaders finally agreed that they should not form the government. Instead they wanted Banerjee to dissolve the Assembly and impose President's rule till the new Assembly was elected.

RAJ CHENGAPPA

Gundu Rao on the campaign trail: star performer

Both the Janata and the Congress(I) are keen on an early election for their own reasons. While the Janata wants to cash in on the wave of sympathy for Hegde, the Congress(I) would do their level best to counter it. In this they face an uphill task. They lack a leader of credibility and stature to match Hegde.

Although Gundu Rao is keen on getting back to the saddle his torrid three-year rule is likely to rule him out. Moily has been discredited after the famous tape scandal where he is alleged to have offered an MLA Rs 2 lakh to defect. K.H. Patil, the state Congress(I) chief feels he should lead but with his key supporter former Union Minister of state S.M. Krishna being trounced in the poll his chances are receding. S. Bangarappa joined the Congress(I) only recently after his unsuccessful marriage with the Janata. As Union Minister Jaffer Sharief, who defeated George Fernandes, put it: "The leadership issue will be ticklish."

The Congress(I) high command is more likely to lean on one of the members of Parliament to provide leadership in the state. A hot favourite is Janardhan Poojari, the new Union minister of state for finance, who is reportedly close to the prime minister and enjoys an untarnished image in the state. At 47, Poojari, a former lawyer, has age on his side but lacks the experience and the maturity to run a state government. But Poojari has the advantage of belonging to the Idigas (toddy tapper) community, a backward class in the state. Since the Janata Party is accused of being ruled by the dominant communities, the Congress(I) is keen on cashing in on the support of the weaker sections by choosing a man from their lot. But Poojari himself is undecided about coming back to state politics.

Right now the Congress(I) is still at sea in the state. Hegde has certainly seized the initiative by calling for a dissolution. As Poojari admitted: "Hegde is a shrewd and clever man. He is hoping to get popular sympathy." Nor has the Janata done too badly in the Lok Sabha. The Congress(I) won on reduced margins in most of constituencies and this has boosted the Janata morale. If the Congress(I) is unable to project a dynamic leader in the state to counter Hegde's charisma, the former chief minister may not become "irrelevant" as Rajiv Gandhi said he would. As Hegde said: "If assembly elections are held I will get a two-thirds majority." So far, nobody is contesting his claim.

ANDHRA PRADESH

Stemming the Tide

RARELY has anyone plunged into politics on turning 60 by launching a political party and playing the lead role in it. But that is exactly what N.T. Rama Rao (NTR) has done, and successfully, in Andhra Pradesh. His Telugu Desam Party, which will be only three years old in April, has in its debut in the Lok Sabha elections given the Congress(I) a drubbing as good as the one it gave by capturing power in Andhra Pradesh in the assembly elections in January 1983. While the first astounding victory made NTR the chief minister of Andhra Pradesh, its second electoral feat of winning 28 of the 32 Lok Sabha seats it contested has catapulted the Telugu Desam into the rather enviable position of being the largest Opposition party in the new Parliament.

The Telugu Desam sweep across the board to win in all parts of the state has also debunked the theory about it being a one-man, one-election party propped up by a section of the mercantile Khamma community in the deltaic districts of the state. But its thumping success is in large measure due to the one-man show of NTR, who travelled to all the far-flung parts of this largest state in the south in his Chaitanya Ratham. He went to all the 42 constituencies in the state except Khammam, where the CPI and CPI(M) did not put up a united fight and helped the Congress(I) win by default.

By the remarkable electoral adjustment arrived at for 41 constituencies, including two where elections are to be held on January 28 as Independent contestants died, this election became virtually a straight fight between the Congress(I) and the Telugu Desam or one of its electoral allies. Therefore, the contest was keen, but the NTR charisma coupled with grim reminders of the unseemly and undemocratic manner in which he was temporarily unseated in August last year gave the Telugu Desam the cutting edge. NTR himself reminded the voters about the ouster while explaining why he was forced to ask for dissolution of the legislative assembly after the Lok Sabha elections were announced. He told the milling crowds at 150-odd wayside meetings that he recommended dissolution to purge the assembly of those who "betrayed the people's confidence in the Telugu Desam".

A. PRABHAKAR RAO

Rama Rao after the results: lone ranger

The Congress(I) proferred some unintended help to the Telugu Desam and further confirmed the voters' suspicions about its complicity in the ouster move by admitting 22 Telugu Desam defectors of the breakaway Bhaskara Rao faction into the party. The admissions were even made part of the Congress(I) campaign, with state party chief Rajasekhar Reddy announcing the admission of the defectors in small groups of two or three at a time in a futile attempt to pretend that the Congress(I) was gaining support.

The abortive coup episode and the closing of ranks of the Opposition parties in putting up common candidates were not the only reasons for the Telugu Desam victory. NTR's spirited campaign, in which he pointedly asked voters what the sitting MP's of the Congress(I) had done to raise the problems of Andhra Pradesh in Parliament made the latter sitting ducks. All six Central ministers and 17 other sitting Congress(I) members who managed to get tickets fell by the wayside. The octogenarian Lok Sabha front bencher N.G. Ranga was the only one to survive, winning by a margin of 11,894 votes. Union Home Minister P.V. Narasimha Rao lost by a wide margin of 53,198 votes in his native Hanamakonda constituency, though he won comfortably from the Ramtek constituency in Maharashtra. But Energy Minister P. Shiv Shankar who shifted from Secunderabad to Medak, reckoned as the safest seat for the Congress(I), lost ignominously to newcomer P. Manik Reddy of the Telugu Desam by a small margin of 1,816 votes. The Telugu Desam picked up Manik Reddy at the last minute as the DMKP, which was allotted the seat, decided against contesting any seat in Andhra Pradesh. In all, the Congress(I) could win only six seats in the state.

Nonetheless, the Congress(I) began with high expectations and its leader in the dissolved assembly A. Madan Mohan harped time and again that the party would repeat its stupendous 1977 and 1980 performance of winning 41 of the 42 seats in the state.

The Telugu Desam, on the other hand, presented a less comfortable picture before the poll, unsure as it was about the number of seats it would win as the Congress(I) hype about victory was taken seriously even by some of its own leaders. The party's office in Himayatnagar was virtually deserted. NTR himself took the day calmly. In the morning he flew to Gudapalle in Chitoor district to attend the funeral of Telugu Desam President and MLC A.V. Umashankar Reddy, who had been killed on the day before polling.

The chief minister got the first indication his party candidates were leading in key constituencies from police intelligence reports on his way back to Hyderabad from the funeral. NTR stayed in his office keeping track of the news till about 6.40 p.m., when he was sure his party was poised to win a majority of the seats. In the first interview he gave after his triumph the chief minister told INDIA TODAY: "Our win demonstrates the faith of the people, particularly the poor, in the Telugu Desam. They have confidence in me and my party and faith in the manner in which I have dedicated myself to the welfare of the state."

NTR asserts that the voters overwhelmingly supported the Telugu Desam because of its populist welfare programmes for deprived sections like farm labour and destitutes. Said the jubilant chief minister: "The various pensions, rural housing and drinking water supply system in our Pragatipadham programme have convinced people that ours is the government working for the poor and the development of Andhra Pradesh." Whether that is the sole factor or not for the verdict the party and its allies got a little over 50 per cent of the votes polled.

AS FOR the Congress(I) sweep across the country, Rama Rao says: "It is the people's mandate there and I accept it. The trend and wind were favourable to them but the win might not have been so impressive if the Opposition had been united." Explaining the debacle of the Opposition throughout the rest of the country, Rama Rao remarked: "They could not convince people they are united. Oneness was not shown. Only diversity was expressed. If all of them sailed together or spoke from a common platform to create the impression that they were definitely together, things would have been different, much better."

Though he is silent about the reasons for the Congress(I)'s failure in Andhra Pradesh, except for mentioning that it was discredited for its corrupt and inefficient rule earlier, the chief minister cannot ignore the fact that the Congress(I) got about 42 per cent of the votes, an increase of 9 per cent over the votes polled by the party in the 1983 elections. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi spent about three days addressing nearly 30 meetings in various parts of the state and rounded off his visit with a Christmas-eve rally in Hyderabad. But his arguments that the subsidised Rs 2 a kilo of rice scheme and the mid-day meal programme were ideas of the Congress(I), and that the sale of handloom dhotis and sarees at cheaper prices was subsidised by the Central Government did not wash with the voters. The whirlwind tour of the film actor Krishna in the last week—which ended abruptly after he was injured in stone-throwing—also seems to have been counter-productive. His campaign was no match for the last film of NTR, Srimad Virat Bhramendra Swami Charitra, released on November 29 and seen by over one crore, according to the estimates of film distributors, in four weeks.

NTR denies he depends on "cine star charisma" for his votes. Says he: "There are demands from people for me to act in one picture at least every year. Some tried to influence me through a senior cabinet colleague, Srinivasulu Reddy. I would like to do it, but it will not be possible before the assembly elections as I have to tour intensively." Some observers argue that besides the film about Brahmendra Swami, the fact that the aircraft carrying NTR for the campaign did not start or leave on time, refusal of permission to use the government helicopter, Rama Rao's head injury early in the campaign and illness in the last three days also influenced voters.

The Congress(I) in the state is virtually dumbstruck after its defeat. None of its normally vociferous members offered any explanation for the debacle, and consoled themselves by saying the party had polled more than in 1983. Union ministers K. Vijayabhaskara Reddy, O. Venkatasubbaiah, P. Shiv Shankar, M. Mallikarjun and M.S. Sanjeevi Rao sent in their resignations after losing. But what hurts the Congress(I) activists in Andhra Pradesh most is the fact that the Telugu Desam will be the main opposition party in the Lok Sabha.

NTR laughs at the prospects of his party having enough members to form a shadow Union cabinet. Says he: "Our MP's have to work hard to focus on the problems and needs of the state. I am planning to see subjects are divided among them and they specialise in specific areas through discussions in the state. About other things we will see later." The state's most immediate problem is one of the finances, with large sums drained on the various populist schemes. Though its position is better compared to that of West Bengal and Kerala, with the assembly election due in April, no additional taxation can be expected in the near future and the state will have to depend heavily on overdrafts.

Among the 28 Telugu Desam MPs are the good-humoured party vice-president Bezwada Pap Reddy, a pilot, Ananda Gajapathi Raju, sugar technologist and industrialist Bolla Bulli Ramaiah and three doctors: Chinta Mohan, G. Vijayrama Rao and T. Kalpana Devi. The other woman MP is N.P. Jhansilakshmi. Three others elected on the Telugu Desam ticket are Harijans and are the only ones who have been members of the Lok Sabha earlier. "With this wide variety of experienced people," says the party General Secretary Upendra, "we are determined to demonstrate in Parliament also that the Telugu Desam is not a narrow-minded regional party as some have tried to paint us, but a powerful political force." Whatever be the party's performance in the new Lok Sabha, the Telugu Desam has confirmed that it is now definitely here to stay as a regional political party in Andhra Pradesh.

JAMMU & KASHMIR

Sweet Revenge

IF THE electoral verdict in Jammu & Kashmir, like Andhra Pradesh, is any indication, it carries a crucial message for the ruling party. Namely, that it does not pay in the long run to topple state governments through dubious means. The National Conference (NC-F) headed by ousted chief minister Farooq Abdullah made a clean sweep in the valley winning all the three seats while conceding just two to the Congress(I) in the Jammu region.Said a jubilant Farooq after the tally: "The mandate has gone against the Congress(I) in Kashmir. Despite large-scale rigging and the use of money power, the people have not accepted the new state government installed by the ruling party".

The NC(F) walked off with three of the four seats it contested in the state with two sitting MP's, Saifuddin Soze and A.R. Kabli winning from Baramullah and Srinagar while Farooq's mother, Begum Akbar Jahan, trounced the Congress(I) candidate Peer Hissamuddin in the Anantnagar constituency. The wide margins of victory have established clearly that Farooq continues to wield considerable clout in state politics and that his estranged brother-in-law and state Chief Minister Ghulam Shah has failed to find political legitimacy.

Shah received his most embarrassing setback when his son Muzzaffar Shah who was instrumental in engineering the defections that led to Farooq's downfall, was humbled by the NC(F)'s Kabli by over two lakh votes in Srinagar. Muzzaffar was being groomed since last year as a political rival to Farooq by his father as well as the Congress(I) and started his election campaign almost immediately after Shah became chief minister last July.

BHAWAN SINGH

Farooq and mother Begum Abdullah: total vindication

During the elections, Shah and his ambitious wife Khalida campaigned extensively for their son. Yet, Kabli, the sitting MP, increased his victory margin by about 20 per cent over the 1983 by-election result. The seat was earlier held by Farooq. The Khalida faction of the National Conference suffered yet another humiliation when its nominee, Mohiuddin Uri, lost to the NC(F)'s Soze by over 1.50 lakh votes.

But the NC(F)'s most impressive victory was in Anantnagar, considered to be a Congress(I) stronghold, where Begum Abdullah won by over 65,000 votes. The applecart was upset by Farooq who prevailed upon his reluctant mother to contest from the constituency. There was cold comfort for the Congress(I) in the Jammu region with the victory of its candidates, Janak Raj Gupta and Pandit Girdhari. Gupta, a political lightweight, was ranged against Dr Karan Singh who fought as an Independent candidate but only managed to finish a poor third after the NC(F) candidate Shabir Ahmed Salaria. The NC(F) was hoping for a split in the Hindu vote between Singh and Gupta. But despite a heavy concentration of over 30 per cent Sikhs and Muslims, Gupta romped home by over 1.2 lakh votes. For Karan Singh,a scion of the erstwhile Kashmir royal family, it was the first electoral defeat of his life.Said Singh philosophically: "The Congress(I) wave has engulfed Jammu also."

But the lesser margins with which the Congress(I) won in the Jammu region means that major problems lie ahead for the Government of Chief Minister Shah. With his failure to win a single seat for the NC(K), his breakaway faction, Shah will be under considerable pressure to quit office and pave the way for fresh assembly elections.

As it is, the Congress(I) has been disappointed with Shah for not being able to establish a firm grip on the state and for his failure to adopt a hard line against Farooq and his supporters. Congress(I) leaders maintain that Farooq's win in the valley was purely due to the support of communal elements whom Shah failed to keep under control.Additionally, Shah also ignored the Congress(I) demand to weed out pro-Farooq elements from the bureaucracy.

In the absence of any documentary evidence against Farooq, the NC(K)'s campaign fell flat in its attempts to justify Farooq's dismissal. With the election verdict clearly in his favour, it now rests with Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi to make the next move.

RAE BARELI

Death Debate

RULING party General Secretary Arun Nehru's weighty electoral victory from the Rae Bareli constituency was somewhat tarnished by the death of H.S. Bajpayee, one of the 19 candidates in the fray. Bajpayee's murder and the mystery surrounding it had already sparked off an Opposition demand for countermanding the poll.

The Opposition complaints revolve around Section 52 of the Election Manual which states that if news of a candidate's death is conveyed to the returning officer before the polling starts, the election is countermanded. However, Chief Election Commissioner R.K. Trivedi made it clear that there was no question of countermanding the poll since the returning officer was only informed about Bajpayee's death after the polling had started at 8 a.m. on December 24. Ruling party sources were firmly convinced that the murder was nothing but a crude attempt to get the poll countermanded.

The murder itself offered few clues. Bajpayee, 55, was last seen on December 21 in Bachharwan where he told associates that he was leaving for Lucknow. His nephew Vijay who always accompanied him was to join him in Rae Bareli the following day. One of his political aides met Bajpayee and Vijay in Rae Bareli on December 22 and 23 and says that Bajpayee was actually trying to withdraw his candidature. He adds he last saw him at 8.30 a.m. on the day before the poll, at a bus stop.

The Independent candidate's body was found some 12 hours later, between 8.00 and 9.00 p.m., some 30 km away from where he was last seen. According to a local school-teacher, Dinesh Chowdhary, the body lay just 1 km away from a police station, and was spotted by a passing bus driver. "Bajpayee's hands and legs had been tied with a wire, and he was lying in a crouched position on the road. He was bleeding profusely from the nose, and was dead for all practical purposes," says Chowdhary.

Two policemen were sent to inform Bajpayee's family of the death. According to the murdered man's daughter, the policemen arrived at their house at about 9 p.m. and asked the family to accompany them to the police station. "When we asked them what it was about, they said it was something very serious in connection with my father. It was only when they finally told us that our father had been killed that we decided to go to the police station." Once there, Mrs Bajpayee was not allowed to see the body, she says, and complains that the body was not even handed over to her the next day but cremated without her knowledge.

Bajpayee (top) and his wife and daughter: mystery death

Villagers maintain stoutly that Bajpayee was dead when his body was taken to the police station. By 1 p.m., the villagers say, the body just disappeared. The official version is dramatically different. Collector P. Chakravarthy claims that Bajpayee was alive when he was found by the police who immediately tried to contact doctors of the local primary health centre. When no help was possible locally, the candidate was rushed to the government hospital at Rae Bareli some 30 km away. The time then, according to the collector, was 11.30 p.m. At the hospital, the doctor on duty, Dr Ashok Shukla, says he saw his patient alive at 3 in the morning. Dr Shukla signed Bajpayee's death certificate at 8.50 p.m. on December 24, almost an hour after polling had begun.

Local Opposition leaders allege that only after consulting senior officials did the local officials decide to show Bajpayee alive, admitting his death only after they ensured that the polling had begun. Chakravarthy is equally vehement. "No doubt he was beaten up badly and left for dead, but he was still alive," he insists.

But the official story is not wholly convincing. If as the collector says, Bajpayee was rushed to the hospital at 11.30, the vehicle must have taken a most circuitous route because he was wheeled into the hospital only at 3. a.m. He was declared dead almost six hours later, after the polling had begun. Chief Medical Officer R.C. Johri, who, acording to the collector, attended on the dead man all through, says: "This was a clear case of coma." But he refused to part with the post-mortem report which would determine the time of death saying it would be made available only to the court.

Though versions of what happened vary there is little doubt that Bajpayee's murder was a conspiracy to get the poll postponed. Inquiries indicate that the murdered man had no personal enemies. According to villagers, the mild-mannered Bajpayee, who has been contesting elections as an Independent since 1967, would not hurt a fly, and counted both Congress(I) men and RSM followers among his friends. Apart from the fact that Vijay who was seen with his uncle last, is missing, another significant fact is that Bajpayee's body was planted conspicuously enough to make the discovery quick and easy. Not only did it lie barely 1 km from the Bachharwan police station, Bajpayee's nomination papers and his election symbol and other paraphernalia and bag were strewn all over and around him to make identification easy.

Rae Bareli is no longer the peaceful backyard of Uttar Pradesh it used to be before 1980. The election of the doughty Arun Nehru from there and the increasing activites of the RSM and its connections with antisocial elements has added to the insecurity of the people there. Somewhere along the line, Bajpayee was caught in the cross current of the two most powerful parties in the area. A CID probe and one by the courts should ideally examine both the circumstances of Bajpayee's death and the alleged attempts to cover up the news. Some local officials are already sceptical about the outcome of such a probe. But for Bajpayee and his family, it is already too late. —RAJU SANTHANAM in Rae Bareli

BIHAR

Poll Toll

GIVEN BIHAR's reputation for poll violence and the number of candidates this time with criminal records (INDIA TODAY, December 31), the incidents that marred the December 24 elections in the state should have come as no surprise. Yet they did. The sheer scale of lawlessness was unprecedented: 23 people were killed in violence that erupted in 24 of the total 54 constituencies in the state. Polling had to be suspended in 156 booths due to reports of booth-capturing at gun-point, large-scale bogus voting, snatching of ballot-papers and blatant looting of ballot-boxes. And the Election Commission had to order repoll in all the 156 booths where voting was suspended half-way through.

This is certainly not the first time criminal elements tried to scuttle the election exercise. In 1977, too, there were instances of violence—13 people were killed and repoll ordered in 40 booths—but they were confined to crime-infested districts like Nalanda, Gaya and Aurangabad. This time round officials, anticipating trouble, called in thousands of paramilitarymen whose armed presence was conspicuous throughout the state. Besides, as a precautionary measure, 2,000 "listed" criminals and 5,000 political workers and "trouble-makers" were picked up by the police on the eve of elections. Yet when the crunch came, all these counted for nothing.

"If the reports of disturbances and violence are true, they definitely show an unhappy trend," acknowledged Satish Bhatnagar, chief electoral officer of Bihar. With politicians of all hues brazenly employing mercenaries to do their dirty work, the situation apparently went totally out of control. In Bhagalpur, five people were killed, in Jehanabad nine, in Gaya, Monghyr and Muzaffarpur two each and one each in Patna, Nalanda, Aurangabad, Madhubani and Saharua. Chief Secretary K.K. Srivastava had to declare that the Government would impose collective fines in areas affected by poll violence.

Ironically enough, a member of the state Government—Minister of State for Public Health Engineering Department Awadhesh Singh—was accused of indulging in criminal activities. The police had issued a warrant for his arrest on the charge that he had captured ballot-papers at gun-point at the Kanchanpura booth of Aurangabad Lok Sabha constituency. Singh's own version was that the police were after him because he had shouted at a presiding officer for conniving with the Opposition. Few were above blame—in Saharsa and Madhubani districts, three presiding officers and two patrolling officers were arrested for dereliction.

As if this wasn't enough, new records were set in "bogus" voting as well as in brash new ways of "fixing" the polls. In some booths, the polling was an incredible 100 per cent, and in others, more than 100 per cent. For instance, in one booth in Madhubani, although only 863 voters had been registered, the ballot-box contained 864 votes. In some booths, voters who had patiently queued up to cast their votes were turned away with the amazing explanation that they had "already voted". V.N. Mallick, a college student from Muzaffarpur, when confronted with this baffling statement, kicked up a fuss. Only then was he allowed to vote—in the name of a woman voter. Not far away, in Muzaffarpur's Damuchuk Mohalla, incredulous passers-by saw polling officer R.B. Sharma relaxing under a peepul tree while just 11 young men voted again and again for hours.

Photographs by K.M. KISHAN

Purainia village destroyed in poll-related violence; and (below) underaged voter caught by the police

This phenomenon was evidently not confined to small, out-of-the-way booths. Right in the state capital of Patna, according to state election office sources, Chief Electoral Officer Bhatnagar saw a handful of boys in their early teens voting continuously in a booth on Hardinge Road. But he could not do anything, said officials, unless someone else challenged it because the "presiding or poll officer is not supposed to know the voter's bona fides, age or sex. That is the law".

One candidate in crime-infested Monghyr, former inspector general of police Fazal Ahmed, of the Janata Party had to take the law into his own hands. He single-handedly aborted a plan at booth-capturing. When men in police uniform muscled in, Ahmed challenged them and sent them packing—the uniforms turned out to be fake. In Gopalganj, an armed gang hijacked a polling party, snatched the ballot-papers, stamped and stuffed the box with them. In this case, however, the authorities ordered fresh polling.

Bihar certainly provides a very frightening lesson. P.K. Sinha, former general secretary of the Bihar Administrative Services Association put his finger on it: "If these trends are not checked immediately, genuine voters will be compelled to be indifferent and the ministers, MP's and MLA's will represent only the gangs of criminals."

The prelude to last fortnight's elections produced some fascinating campaign sidelights that have been largely engulfed by the eventual and staggering outcome of the poll. INDIA TODAY state correspondents document some of the more memorable moments they came across on the campaign trail.

Coining Phrases

■ Actor Sunil Dutt, the Congress(I) candidate from Bombay north-west, is no political heavyweight but he must have been wishing that it were quite literally true when his enthusiastic campaign publicity department sent out photographs showing the tall and well-built star perched on a pair of scales being weighed against coins with a large crowd of Versova Sikhs gathered around. The truth, as it transpired, was a bit different.

Whether it was the acute coin shortage in the city or the fact that the Sikhs are currently not overly enthusiastic about the Congress(I), the organisers of the coin-weighing function discovered to their acute embarrassment that they could not collect enough coins to match the matinee hero's weight. To tilt the balance, one smart helper slipped a heavy stone into the bag of coins.

Some spoilsports in the crowd, however, spotted the subterfuge and demanded that the bag be emptied and the coins piled on the scales in everybody's view. Hot words followed when the organisers refused to oblige and the situation could have literally got out of hand when Dutt himself saved the situation by gently remarking, without intending the puns, that a stone or two didn't make any difference, it was the thought that counted.

Sunil Dutt: short changed

GOPAL SHETTY

Heavy Clout

■ Talking of political heavyweights proved quite a tongue-twister in Mysore where the biggest problem was not just the candidate's name—Srikanta Datta Narasimharaja Wodeyar, but his size as well. The scion of the former ruler of Mysore tops the scales at over 200 kg and still seems to glory in the past. He still occupies a sizeable section of the former palace and his campaign office is set amidst ivory panelled doors, period rosewood furniture and elaborate chandeliers.

His personal staff still call him "His Highness" though his opponents prefer to refer to him as "His Heaviness". But he obviously carries enough feudal weight for the Congress(I) to have given him a ticket though politics is hardly a favourite hobby of his. He is better known for his collections which include hotels (five at the last count), race horses (22), vintage cars and watches. For the elections, he obviously hopes to cash in on the goodwill built up by his late father. Despite his size, Wodeyar has a voice that is hardly audible, which is why his campaign was quite low-pitched.

Political Tricks

■ He has the aplomb of a Houdini and the stage presence of a Sorcar. But Madan Kundu's claims to magical fame lie mainly in the art of political conjuring, a field in which he excelled himself during last fortnight's election campaign in, naturally, the star constituency of Amethi. When Rajiv Gandhi's campaign carousel hit the constituency last fortnight, the show-stopper was Kundu's act which must rank as one of the most unique election gimmicks in the ruling party's arsenal.

To a rapt audience that included Rajiv, his wife Sonia, and a clutch of the

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

international print and broadcast media, Kundu displayed two black slates wiped clean of any writing. He then asks the question: "What do the people want?" He turns one slate and presto, the word 'Progress' is mysteriously inscribed. The answer to the second inevitable question of what else do the people want appears on the second slate: 'Stability'. The slates are elaborately wiped clean and Kundu poses the punch line: "Who can give you these?" With a theatrical flourish he once again turns the slates to reveal 'Rajiv' inscribed on one and on the other, the symbol of the hand.

SUMAN DUBEY

Kundu: sleight of hand

His next act is even better. An interlinked chain resembling the Olympic symbol made up of five metal rings. "The Opposition comes and tells you they will form a strong government. What kind of strong government?" he asks and holding up the chain replies, "as strong as this", effortlessly peeling off the rings one by one and flinging them flamboyantly into the cheering crowd.

But Kundu's piece de resistance is reserved for the last, a clever variation of the magician's standard sawing-the-lady-in-half trick. Into an upturned box fitted together in three sections and painted in the colours of the Indian flag steps a young lady. The box is locked with strategically placed holes revealing her face, one arm and a foot. Kundu then steps forward brandishing a long lethal-looking sword and once again harangues the audience. "This is Mother India. Our country is threatened by foreign forces like this and like this," he says, thrusting the sword viciously into the box. "They want to divide the country like this," he goes on, removing the middle section of the box sideways on sliding rollers. "Mother India is too strong for them," he finishes, straightening out the box and letting out the lady who has survived the ordeal without a scratch. Score one for the Congress(I).

Numbers Game

■ Madurantakam constituency in Tamil Nadu's Chingleput district posed some unique electoral problems this time. For one, the candidates almost outnumbered the electorate with a record 90 people contesting. For the Election Commission, the fact that 87 of them were Independents posed nightmarish problems since only 25 election symbols available for Tamil Nadu. The size of the ballot paper containing all 87 symbols and names was another headache.

The range of candidates was, for the electorate, even more confusing and ranged from Harijans and landless labourers to rickshaw-pullers, all with individual reasons for contesting. "It is cheaper for a Harijan to contest. The deposit is only Rs 250," said one.

To everybody's surprise, the jumble eventually sorted itself out with the symbols decided upon including carrots, pumpkins, tables, chairs, mugs and jugs. Specially-made ballot boxes to accommodate the extra-large paper were also hastily constructed. But just as election officials were heaving a sigh of relief, the biggest bombshell dropped when 84 of the 87 Independents announced that they were retiring from the contest and had only stood because they "wanted to expose the loopholes in electoral law which allowed anybody and everybody to contest". But the move was greeted with great relief by the remaining candidates who were obviously convinced that too many crooks had brothed the spoil.

Foot in Mouth

■ Elections bring out the worst in some candidates and one prominent campaigner who certainly got the worst of the exchanges was rotund railway minister Ghani Khan Chowdhury. Incensed with Dr Farooq Abdullah for campaigning against him in Muslim-dominated parts of Malda district, Chowdhury charged that the former Jammu & Kashmir chief minister was a "traitor" and still held a British passport. "We will not spare him," snarled the minister at a well-attended press conference at which he also claimed that Dr Abdullah had tried settling Pakistanis in Jammu & Kashmir.

The railway minister was obviously on the wrong track and soon ran into a head-on collision with West Bengal Chief Minister Jyoti Basu who, when newsmen relayed to him Chowdhury's charges, pointed out that both Chowdhury and Farooq Abdullah had spent some years studying in Britain, the only difference being that one of them could not get through his exams while the other did. Nobody was left in any doubt as to which of the two had finally got derailed.

Tit for Tat

■ In metaphorical terms, the election exchanges have never been better—or more confused. Tamil Nadu, the land of film dialogues, naturally took the cake. In Coimbatore, Rajiv Gandhi started the ball rolling by comparing the Opposition to crabs in a bucket of water. The moment one of the crabs tried to crawl out of the bucket, the others would simply pull it back.

Karunanidhi, not one to let opportunities slip, unsheathed his metaphorical claws at the next meeting by saying that crabs are supposed to have a 'deadly hold' and the opposition parties had a real grip on the people. "So we don't mind being called crabs," he declared triumphantly, adding in the same vein, "but if we are crabs, the alliance between the Congress(I) and the AIADMK is a tie-up between a frog and a mouse." He then went into what must rank as the most mixed metaphor ever recorded. The frog, he said, would pull the mouse towards the water and the mouse would pull the frog towards the land. The alliance wouldn't hold any water and wouldn't land anywhere. A hawk would then swoop down from the sky and quickly swallow them both. Quite a mouthful that.

Karunanidhi: convoluted counter

Pill Poll

■ The man who must have breathed the biggest sigh of relief when the campaign deadline arrived was Karnataka Chief Minister Ramakrishna Hegde, and with perfectly justifiable reason. Already handicapped by an afflicted throat, the Janata Party's star electoral turn resembled a mobile dispensary as accompanying doctors pumped him with an array of medicants to help him finish the full campaign course.

Whatever Hegde's electoral gains at the hustings, the doctors must take the major credit. When Hegde kicked off his campaign, his medical chart registered only a mildly sore throat. By the 15th day, almost 200 meetings later, he had added high fever to the list and his throat, as his doctors warned, was in danger of being permanently impaired. The only concession Hegde made was to cancel a days programme while he was pumped full of pain killers, throat sootheners and Cortizones. By the 22nd day, his voice had been reduced to a barely audible squeak and he was reluctantly forced to cancel the last day's campaign since, as he remarked later when his vocal chords had recovered, "I had no voice left". The next morning, an excrutiating backache finally convinced Hegde that enough was enough and gathering his family together, took off for the Nandi Hills resort for a much overdue rest with nobody being more relieved than his panic-stricken doctors. The trip was kept a secret as, in Hegde's words: "The mercy of my friends would have been killing". And so would have been the ordeal of the campaign had he not called it quits when he did.

Hegde: mobile dispensary

Smile Awhile

S-M-I-L-E. It does beautiful things to you and people around. A true smile comes straight from your heart. It is reflected in the warm glow of your eyes and helps you relax your entire nervous system. Here a smile, there a smile and you spread a cheerful, life-is-a-wonderful-thing aura about you. So flash it and wow! Just watch your friendships grow.

And remember lady! Smiling does wonders to your complexion. Because it exercises facial muscles, which improves blood circulation — to give your complexion a healthy glow. It's that simple. So, go right ahead. Smile!

Hold Hostilities

The old belief is still good. Count till 10 when you feel your blood rising. Anger usually boomerangs, breeding ill-feeling towards you. And you know something? Every time you blaze fury, you're shortening your life span. No kidding! Your pulse rate quickens and your arteries get constricted, making your heart,beat much more than its average 103,689 times a day. So watch it the next time you find things going haywire.

Sound Yourself Softly

Check your soundtrack. The human ear responds best to a soft,well-modulated pitch. (That's why you like music, not noise) A harsh tone is like nails scraping on a blackboard. You know how creepy that is. So tune yourself and leave'em hanging onto every word.

Laugh It Off

Intellicom.

Once you know something about it, you'll probably lose interest in all other electronic intercoms.

For the simple reason that Intellicom is one of the most advanced electronic intercom systems anywhere in the world today.

Just like it was, when it was launched in the U.S.A. ten years ago.

Superphone now bring to you this same state-of-the-art CMOS space division technology with assistance from the people who put it on the map, worldwide:
Tone Commander Systems, U.S.A.

Intellicom looks like an intercom. And works like an intercom.

But thinks like a computer.

To start with, it's the most easily expandable system there is. So you can start with 20 lines and go all the way up to 80.

Where and when you want. And without tearing up your office.

But the most outstanding feature of Intellicom is its features.

A dozen of them. And they read like the pages of a science-fiction novel.

For instance, if you're with someone else, your calls are transferred to that person's instrument.

Automatically.

Or if your line is busy, your incoming calls could be transferred to your secretary.

Automatically.

Or if the party you're calling is busy, the exchange will call you once his line is free.

Automatically.

Or it allows you to hold a conference by including up to 5 people. At the touch of a button.

Or it allows you to 'hold' a call while you consult with a third person.

Then there's the 'Do Not Disturb' facility which delinks your instrument from the rest of the system.

Not to mention the 'Group Call Pick-up' which means a ringing station can be answered by any one of 10 stations in the same group.

Intellicom gives you a choice of two models. The ML 40 and the ML 80, which allow 4 and 8 pairs respectively to talk at the same time.

Both allow instant modular expansion. By just inserting 5-line extension cards.

Plus a self-diagnostic L.E.D. indication to tell you if something has gone wrong. So you can put it right.Instantly.

As if this was not enough, there are two optional features: Paging. And Free-talk facility so you can talk without lifting the handset.

Intellicom receivers come in two sleek models and in a range of stunning two-tone combinations. With a push-button key pad. Or you can have a rotary dial-face if you like.

Intellicom.

When you've seen it, you've seen everything.

Antulay's poster ploy

Wrong Rose

■ Does a rose by any other name smell just as sweet? Apparently not if the olfactory organs of voters in Raigad are any indication. Having smelled something fishy in the sudden reincarnation of former chief minister A.R. Antulay as a candidate of the Indirawadi Maharashtra Congress, they gave little credence to his promises to deliver the development goods even if he was in the opposition. His supporters even put up a banner describing Antulay as a candidate of the 'Indirawadi Maharashtra Government'. It was promptly removed when newspapers pointed to it as a ploy to convince the people that he was still in the Government.

But the confusion was not confined to the electorate alone. Shalinitai Patil, wife of the chief minister and one of Antulay's bitterest foes, returned with her face the colour of her Revlon lipstick when she stepped onto a dais festooned with pictures of Indira Gandhi and tricolour flags and started giving an election speech only to be greeted with cries of "Barrister Antulay zindabad".

Stone Walling

■ Quilon is a Kerala backwater and Tangasseri is the backwaters' backwater. But in certain areas, this little southern outpost is streets ahead of the rest of the country. The township proudly boasts of a Tangasseri Wall Owners Association which claims membership of "every wall owner in Tangasseri" and according to its secretary, Rufus A. Gomez, is dedicated to making people "realise the need and importance of having a clean wall"

Pristine walls in Tangasseri

Not surprisingly, election time is when the association faces its greatest exposure in its bid to preserve the pristine condition of the town walls. As Gomez points out: "The association was founded to prevent the defacing of the well-maintained walls of the locality by the numerous electioneering political parties". To back up their aims, those who dare to touch brush or poster to wall are threatened with a voter boycott and the association is now hoping that similar groups will soon sprout in other parts of the country thus giving them a larger canvas to pursue their purpose. The Tangasseri association is obviously not writing itself off just yet.

Condom Counter

■ Quilon had other novel features to unsheath during last fortnight's elections. The Congress(I) candidate, Krishna Kumar, being the former chairman of Hindusthan Latex, the condom-manufacturing company, laid himself wide open to an ingenious campaign assault by his rival, R.S. Unni of the RSP.

Thousands of RSP workers gathered on the national highway between Quilon and Alleppy, each armed with a Nirodh condom. At a signal, thousands of condoms bloomed as they were blown up by the workers and then, at another signal, burst with a collective bang accompanied by the slogan: "Krishna Kumar alias Nirodh Kumar is going to go burst at Quilon." Whether or not Kumar's electoral balloon is pricked or not, the red-faced bureaucrat had no prophylactic to counter the assault.

BUDIGUPPE

Village view

HOW DOES a village react to an election and what goes through a voter's mind as he heads to the polling booth? To find out, Correspondent RAJ CHENGAPPA stationed himself from sunrise to sunset in Budiguppe, a tiny hamlet 60 km from Bangalore on polling day. His report:

Photographs by RAJ CHENGAPPA

The cheeky signboard outside Budiguppe

SALARIED government servants, servants of the cooperative department and corrupt politicians will not be allowed into the village without the prior permission of the villagers. Visiting hours 6 to 7 p.m. Mondays holidays", says a sign in Kannada posted by the stone track leading to Budiguppe village, 60 km from Bangalore. It is a symbol of the once-militant farmers movement in Karnataka. But its warning has long since been forgotten. In fact on December 24, when "salaried government servants" opened a polling booth in the village primary school, they were welcomed.

For Koralingaiah Gowda, 45, the balding dhoti-clad convenor of the Budiguppe unit of the Rajya Ryotha Sangha, or farmers association, this was hardly surprising. Swathed in a green scarf—another symbol of the farmers movement—and seated in the tiny village square, he declared with a twinkle in his eye: "Election day is like a big festival. We put on our best clothes, drink and enjoy." And a festive spirit certainly pervaded the village, for the previous night Congress(I) workers had distributed their cache of liquor: 60 quarter bottles of arrack and 60 litres of toddy for anyone who was man enough to drink—including Janata Party men. For the village elders, 10 bottles of beer were provided.

The Janata Party workers, however, were a rather sour lot because although they had received several crates of rum a week ago these had been quickly exhausted. Their election day quota, they alleged, had been seized by excise officials on its way to the village. But party loyalty did not dissuade them from taking a few swigs from the Congress(I) stock. So much so that by 10 p.m. the village square was filled with boisterous men staggering around drunkenly and arguing vociferously. And though threats were freely exchanged no brawls took place because, said Janata Party worker Basavaraj: "Tomorrow we have to face each other again and we certainly cannot afford to be enemies."

The distribution of liquor, or sarai as it is called in Kannada seems to have become an election ritual despite the election commissioner's ban on liquor sales for two days prior to the polls. Political parties still believe in the old village homily quoted by bus conductor N.M. Aradhya: "Those who drink your liquor will sing your song." But the villagers have gone one better, and tend to think like Kannada film actor and Janata supporter Uday Kumar, who told them at a public meeting the previous day: "Drink from everyone who gives you liquor and then sing your own song."

That is exactly what the villagers do. And so it was a rather bleary-eyed lot that greeted the booth officials on election day. Ironically, B. Linge Gowda, 34, a Congress(I) worker who coordinated the liquor distribution expresses concern about this "dirty part" of electioneering. Says he: "Most of the youngsters learn how to drink during election time and soon become addicts."

There are nine candidates in the fray in Kanakapura constituency of which Budiguppe is a part. But in the village only three parties really matter. These are the ruling Janata Party, the Congress(I) and the Rajya Ryotha Sangha. And relations between the candidates are exceptionally good. That is not surprising, because all of them have, in the words of Linge Gowda "blood relationships". Kempe Gowda, the Janata Party leader is related to Koralingaiah Gowda, the local Ryotha Sangha convenor, and both are distantly related to Linge Gowda, the Congress(I) worker. Said Koralingaiah: "We fight like goats during election time. But at 4 p.m. when the booth closes we are the best of friends. We are one."

Every third person in the village has the suffix Gowda because of the 270 families in the village at least 130 are from the Gowda (agriculturist) community. They are Vokkaligas, one of the two dominant communities in the state, the other being the Lingayats. The Gowdas of Budiguppe are divided about equally in their political loyalties. In Basavaraj's family, for instance, his elder brother Maralingaiah is a Ryotha Sangha supporter while his younger brother Nagesh is a staunch Congress(I) loyalist. Basavaraj himself is in the Janata Party.

Though Budiguppe has a relatively modern political outlook it is still backward socially. The village has 50 Harijan families who to this day are treated as untouchables. They live in a segregated block of houses joined to the village by a road lined with human refuse. When the Janata Government sunk three borewells for drinking water recently a separate one was dug for the Harijans. The village hotel has crockery set aside for the Harijans, who have to wash their own plates after they use them. It is not surprising then that they vote solidly for the Congress(I). Said Marialaga, 22, an agricultural labourer: "Only Indiramma cared for us. The others just exploit us."

Half an hour after the polling booth had opened at 8 a.m. only 34 people had voted, all of them men. The women waited until they had cooked lunch for their families before turning up. Although they voted in almost equal numbers as the men, most of them finally cast their vote for the parties their husbands supported. Emerging from her smoke-filled kitchen Yashodamma, wife of Koralingaiah, said: "Whoever my yajamana (lord of the house) asks me to vote for I will vote for." Her yajamana bashfully admitted: "We have not given them the capacity to vote so far," meaning the men had not allowed the women the freedom to have their own views.

EVEN the women from the backward classes and Scheduled Tribes seem more forward than their upper class counterparts. When Koralingaiah Gowda tried to tell Munilingamma, a backward class woman to vote for the Ryotha Sangha she snarled back: "How dare you ask me to vote for your party. You never bothered when I suffered without water. You had no tears when I lost my husband. Where were you when there was no electricity or when my drains got blocked and stank up the whole place? All you do is sit there and twirl your moustache while we suffer." Retorted Madamma, wife of an agricultural labourer to a Congress(I) worker who sought her vote: "Once we vote for your candidate he will live in a posh house and only feed himself while we continue to starve. Why should we feed him?"

As the day progresses small groups of villagers gather around the square and discuss politics. Kuntenanja Gowda, 60, his eyes clouded over by cataract, asks: "What did Chandrashekhar Murthy (the Congress(I) candidate) do in the eight years that he was in the Lok Sabha? He never even once visited us. But look at Sindhia, (the Janata candidate). He brought us at least this road when before there was only a jungle path; he got borewells dug and at least he comes to listen to our problems. We must give the Janata another chance." Linge Gowda, a little upset by the way the discussion was progressing, said: "Most people will vote because of community. Chandrashekar is a Vokkaliga while Sindhia is from the Maratha community. People are not happy with Sindhia because he believes only in physical power. He has only goondas as followers." Basavaraj retorts furiously: "You are singing Congress(I) songs because they fed you with liquor. You were a Janata supporter. But now you have gone to the other side." A few elders tell them to cool off before the discussion gets violent.

Poster being pulled down at the end of the voting day

Near the village square Kempe Gowda, the Janata leader, looks worried, but says: "People are happy with the small work that we have done like light, water and roads. We have good chances of winning." To which Koralingaiah Gowda said: "It was your job to provide water and light. Why are you making so much noise about bores and rigs? All political parties have become useless and corrupt."

Inevitably the discussion veers around to Rajiv Gandhi's speech at Kanakapura two days before. Says Kunte Nanje Gowda: "He seems a good boy. He spoke well. But what I didn't like was at the end he asked us to raise our hands to know who all are supporting the Congress(I), just like some other politician." Quite a few of the villagers are unhappy about what Rajiv asked them to do because they prize the secrecy of the ballot and do not like to commit themselves in public.

Rajiv would also have been surprised to know that the Budiguppe villagers are not bothered about national unity and integration. Instead the discussions were mainly about the work done for the village by the various political parties, the clean image that Rajiv has and caste and communal factors. The amount of money spent by the political parties was another factor. The Janata camp was split, with a section accusing Kempe Gowda of stashing away the money the party had given him to spend for the village. The Congress(I) workers, on the other hand, were broke. They had not even been paid the usual Rs 15 a day for working. So much so that when Rajiv came to Kanakapura none of the party leaders were willing to hire a lorry to take the people to him and even told some of the people that the meeting had been cancelled.

But these differences do not seem to have troubled the voters. By 4 p.m. when the booth closed 616 of the 800 registered voters had cast their votes, making it a record turnout of 77 per cent. As the sun set gloriously over Budiguppe the villagers had split into small groups, each villager claiming his party would win. Said Linge Gowda: "All this tamasha will go on for at least a week after the results. Then life will become normal again." In Budiguppe, at least, Indian democracy was certainly alive and voting.

IN SOUND, smell and style it is a unique celebration of democracy, a five-yearly date when the voter sheds his burden of quotidian trivia and assumes the mantle of kingmaker. And in the pulsating build-up to this climax he is wooed as never before, by the high and the low, the mighty and the humble. Election campaigns take to the road like colourful circuses, poster wars devour empty walls, and an ear-shattering cacophony of speech, songs and slogans reverberates across the entire country for three weeks and more.

There is inventiveness in the campaigns. They have their share of the absurd as much as touches of pure genius. Their lighter moments and their wearisome ones. But above all they are a concentration of enormous energy. Candidates sleep three or four hours a day as they rush about imploring, cajoling, beseeching, begging support. Vehicles carrying supporters and party workers scurry about ceaselessly in lanes and dusty country tracks, bringing a touch of rare gaiety to what are all too often drab lives.

Then there are the contrasts. The neta who campaigns with an army of supporters, who has headquarters in each kasba, who assigns workers and transport with computer-like precision aiming to reach every citizen and visit every village in search of success. At the other end of the spectrum is the lone ranger, a man on a cycle or riding a lonely rickshaw, megaphone pressed to his mouth competing for attention with the blaring loudspeakers of lottery ticket sellers.

The images conflict and reconcile themselves with amazing facility. Invocations to the memory of a slain leader. Catchy graffiti etched on a wall. The face of a candidate in a grotesque line drawing, plainly a caricature of a four-colour photograph pasted alongside. Election art, easily recognised as a close relation of the art of cinema hoardings, at its best and its worst. This is the flavour of a national election when for one brief moment the humble are proud and the proud are humbled.

THE ASSASSINATION

The Silent Prisoner

WITH the arrest of Simranjeet Singh Mann, key suspect in the Indira Gandhi assassination case and underground since last July, there was hope of a quick unravelling of the threads of the conspiracy. But expectations that the former Punjab police officer would talk were soon belied. Disclosed an official in Bharatpur where Mann is currently being held: "We expected him to sing, but the only birds that tweet come from the famous sanctuary here."

Mann was caught in the company of four Sikhs as they attempted to cross into Nepal through the border district of Purnea in Bihar. Described as rich transporters from Calcutta, they seemed only to know that Mann was wanted by a detention order under the NSA. And they could well be telling the truth, judging by the manner of the attempted escape—effected with few precautions —and the fact that Mann is known to have confided little.

Mann: tight-lipped

The jeep carrying the fivesome was stopped by customs and police officials who refused to allow the vehicle into Nepal. Suspected of being smugglers, Mann and his friends were questioned and their baggage searched. The contents of Mann's luggage could not have been more incriminating—copies of his letters to President Zail Singh, and other equally interesting documents. Immediately alerted, the officials held back Mann's passport and tipped off security agencies like the Intelligence Bureau and others. In a foolish attempt to get away, one transporter offered a bribe of Rs 62,000. Said an official: "This was so stupid. Besides, the fact that the huge sum would have at least made any official think twice before taking the bribe, by the time they offered the money, there were too many security agencies involved."

The fact remains, however, that Mann's arrest occurred purely by chance and at a place he was least expected. Intelligence agencies had earlier claimed that Mann had gone over to Pakistan within days of the killing. After the arrest, one intelligence agency opined that he had left the country before the assassination. Very little of course is really known about Mann's movements. But investigators consider it reasonable to assume that he was based in Calcutta and making frequent trips to Delhi. His contacts in that city were all Sikhs prominently connected with the All India Sikhs Coordination Committee led by an arrested transporter.

The 'hideout in West Bengal' theory makes for logic. With an opposition government in power, the assumption was that state security agencies would not keep as keen a watch on the activities of Akalis and suspected Punjab extremists, as would agencies in a Congress(I)-ruled state. Reports from Calcutta state that security officials are trying to verify rumours that Mann was close to some police officers there. They are also on the hunt for another Calcutta-based transporter missing since the arrest.

In the melange of theories and assumptions, two facts definitely link Mann with the death of Mrs Gandhi: the sighting of the former policeman near the Ashok Lines home of slain assassin Beant Singh and, more vital, disclosures made by Satwant Singh, the surviving assassin. Satwant is reported to have reiterated Mann's involvement in no uncertain terms. He also told the team that Beant often spoke of Mann in glowing terms.

The modus operandi was to get to the target by manipulating at the lower level. In this case, he operated through sub-inspector Beant Singh and is considered the constable's principal motivator. An official said: "After Operation Bluestar, Beant Singh was connected with a group of Sikhs who were amateurishly discussing various ways and means of killing Mrs Gandhi. But that conspiracy was over in August. Why should Beant suddenly pick up the threads from October?"

By the middle of October, Beant showed signs of 'indoctrination'—a reflection of the fact that he was meeting Mann regularly. He made a note of a religious passage at the Bangla Saheb Gurudwara on October 13, he took his wife to the Sisganj Gurudwara on October 17, after which he went to the Akal Takht to meet Satwant, and on October 24 he took Satwant to the gurudwara in R.K. Puram. But for all these bits of information to fall into place, Mann's own testimony is crucial—and for the moment, at least, he remains tightlipped.

Denying involvement in the assassination, Mann is reported to have told interrogators that what had happened to Sikhs in the aftermath of the death was final proof that the Government was being ruled by Hindus. "I had some contacts," he is reported to have claimed in another context, "who told me that I was about to be suspended." Asked who, he replied: "That is for you to find out."

Beant Singh: motivation factor

Lodged in Bharatpur Central Jail under utmost secrecy Mann is being heavily guarded in the inner cordon of the jail normally housing undertrials. "Routine" precautions to thwart any suicide bids were taken with the removal of the flush chain in the toilet and concealment of the wire from which the light bulb is suspended. As a worried official explained: "We will be finished if Mann commits suicide." For this reason jail authorities got Mann to replace his thick kada (bangle) with a thin one—after applying considerable pressure.

A new superintendent has been appointed solely to ensure that no attempts are made to reach Mann through the employees. A jail guard spends the night with Mann, a police guard stands outside his door, another peers at him from the watchtower, and a fourth is posted outside the rear wall of his room. As a final security measure, bugs planted beneath the floors of Mann's three-room suite can carry the least circumstantial whisper across to waiting securitymen.

In the face of such security, Mann's silence has come as a damper. But officials are confident of getting onto something definite soon. They have not ruled out the Oslo connection and neither have they entirely accepted defecting diplomat Harjinder Singh's denial of any connection with Beant Singh. There is a new twist likely to this tale by the report that the diplomat's friendship with Beant was not reported to the authorities by a senior official.

By last week, there were reports that the investigating team would be reorganised and those concerned with the earlier part of the probe axed. An official said :"The earlier inquiries were done hurriedly and did not suggest a very deep-rooted conspiracy. Now the team is convinced that the assassination is not the handiwork of merely Beant and Satwant Singh."

Whoever comprises the revamped investigating team, one possible lead for them is the arrest of Bhindranwale's nephew Jasbir Singh who was flown in from Manila. Although there is no evidence yet of Jasbir's involvement in the assassination, an official pointed out that he was a prominent extremist based abroad and had been making frequent visits to Pakistan. "We are sure that if he talks, we may get something on the foreign angle," the official added.

For the Government, which sent a formal note of protest to Pakistan in connection with a recent Sikh convention at Nankana Saheb in that country where Jasbir raised fiery pro-Khalistan slogans, his detention is a welcome sign. Refused permission to stay in England by the British Home Office, Jasbir was turned away at Dubai and detained at Manila by the Philippines authorities until an Indian Airlines aircraft brought him to India on December 26.

Like pieces in a jigsaw puzzle, the theories of conspiracy and foreign involvement clash with facts and figures garnered from various sources. But the most important source still remains unyielding—Mann himself. And even if he should choose to speak, it is not certain whether the pieces will fit exactly. That is possible only when the Justice Thakkar Commission actually gets going. Till then, as one official commented: "All speculation is injurious to healthy investigation."

BHOPAL GAS LEAK

The Legal Damage

AMERICAN lawyers were descending on Bhopal last fortnight like bees to honey-suckle. Within days of the gas leak tragedy they were buzzing about looking for material to file compensation suits in US courts on behalf of the victims and also a substantial cut—as fees—for themselves.

Their initial appearance and the promise of enormous compensation had sent hope surging through the gas-ravaged localities and the shattered victims. But by fortnight's end the euphoria was dying down and in its place came strong doubts. How much did they know about these foreigners? Could they be trusted? What was their game? What papers had they been made to sign? Was the promised money only a mirage? The very people who had formed queues to sign forms giving the power of attorney to the Americans just days ago, were showing clear signs of hostility. Some examples from Jayaprakash Nagar, a slum locality right outside the Carbide premises:

▶ Ram Gopal Sharma, a local Congress(I) leader, is employed in the railways as a mechanical fitter. He says that he has lost count of the number of lawyers whose forms he filled, giving the power of attorney to each of them. Said he: "No one told me that there was any question of giving a percentage of the claim to the lawyers. I can read Hindi but most of the forms were in English. I stopped signing and tried to prevent others when I came to know of their sharing in the compensation." Sharma is among the lucky few in the area who is literate and even he does not know the names or addresses of any of the lawyers.

▶ "A few days ago," says another resident, Kamta Prasad Vishwakarma, "we started questioning one of the lawyers. We asked him for a receipt as proof of the fact that we had given him the power of attorney. He kept avoiding and when we grew insistent, he fled."

▶ Shanta Bai has another problem. The hospital in which she had been treated had given her a medical slip which was evidence of the fact that she had suffered methyl isocyanate (MIC) poisoning. "It is a vital document to seek assistance from the Government. A lawyer, whose name I do not know, took it away and left me with an acknowledgement slip that does not even mention his name."

▶ Bangal Soni, who is in the dairy business, lost one of his four children to MIC and the rest of his family was hospitalised. He has filled forms for two lawyers. Says Soni: "I signed wherever they asked me to. I hope it won't get me into trouble. I couldn't believe that a stranger would fight my case in America. But everyone was filling them, and so did I. Greed got the better of me."

Illiteracy, obviously, was the main culprit. At the height of the rush, few questions were asked and thousands of people gave the power of attorney to more than one lawyer. Few, if any at all, understood what precisely they were signing. S.C. Godha, a Bhopal lawyer who represents the Washington D.C.-based firm of Arthur Lowy and John P. Coale, says that they have so far managed to collect about 10,000 forms—and each form represents a family so the actual number of claimants is much higher. Mahendra R. Mehta, a Chicago-based Indian lawyer whose name figured in the Morarji Desai-Hersh case initially, says that he had collected more than 1,000 forms. And they are only two among many who are working on these lines.

The worst aspect of the affair is that there seems to have been very little—if any—attempt to explain to the victims precisely what the law is all about. The stress has been on collecting as many signatures as possible. Mehta's people, for example, were securing signatures on two agreements, one in Hindi and one, a more detailed one with significantly diffe-

UNION CARBIDE

Grey Areas

AS LAST fortnight drew to an end, the controversy shifted from the Union Carbide pesticide plant to a few kilometres south in Bhopal: to a glass and concrete structure that houses the company's Research and Development (R&D) centre.

The row was started by a report of the Delhi Science Forum (DSF) on the Bhopal gas tragedy which urged the Government to investigate the goings-on at the R&D centre. The report stressed the urgent need to institute effective mechanisms to monitor foreign collaborations and the R&D carried out under these agreements. It also demanded that the inquiry into the Bhopal accident should include the R&D activities of the company which cover "the grey area between peaceful application and biological warfare". The suggestion was instantly grabbed by the media but till month-end, no hard facts had emerged about even the centre's legitimate activities, let alone the "grey areas".

However the centre by itself is interesting enough. With a Rs 2 crore investment, it is the largest of its kind in India and the only one in the country engaged in the discovery of new pesticides. When it was established in 1975, Carbide was influenced by the fact that all pesticide discoveries have so far taken place either in the US, Europe or Japan, and are tested on crops and pests of temperate or cold countries, where conditions vary greatly from the tropical countries.

Carbide's interest in having a well-equipped centre lay in two reasons: one, a place where pesticide discovery could be tried in local conditions and second, to have a place where new molecules developed in the corporation's research centre at Raleigh, North Carolina, could be trial tested under tropical conditions.

Discovery of pesticides is not the centre's only occupation. To offset the expense and time involved, the centre has been in product and process development, formulation and environmental toxicology. Work on an insect screen—for pesticide testing—started only in 1978 and molecular synthesis came in 1980.

As the functions grew, so did the staff. From 25 scientists in 1975, the number has gone up to 60. The equipment today is valued at about Rs 1 crore and includes nuclear magnetic resurgence, infra-red spectrophotometer, and chromotograms. In fact, many of the air and water and plant tests carried out by the Council of Scientific and Industrial Research (CSIR) following the recent tragedy, were conducted at Carbide's R&D centre.

Carbide's R&D centre in Bhopal

In 1980, Union Carbide, US, and Union Carbide, India, entered into a collaborative agreement on screening of new molecules developed in the US against tropical pests. The initial agreement was for 50 molecules to be tested per year in Bhopal and in return the R&D centre was to receive a grant of US $25,000 annually. In 1982, as testing facilities in Bhopal improved, the annual number of molecules was increased to 500 per year and the grant increased to US $ 300,000 per year. According to Carbide sources, a new deal was in the pipeline to test 2,000 molecules each year from 1985 onwards for the parent company for which a grant of US $ 500,000 was being sought.

Carbide scientists argue that they are being unfairly dragged into controversy and it is not as if the Department of Science and Technology (DST) is unaware of its activities. The R&D centre was registered with DST in 1976 for three reasons: it meant income tax relief, ease in import of equipment, and access to government research facilities if required. But registration also means that the company has to forward to DST annually information about projects undertaken, achievements, equipment, and even details of number of scientists employed and their salaries.

Says R&D Manager B.P. Srivastava bitterly: "Because an unfortunate accident occurred, to suggest that we are engaged in anti-national activities is grossly unfair. We are not criminals. These reckless allegations have deeply hurt all of us scientists. We are Indians too. We have regularly had scientists from CSIR, Indian Council of Agricultural Research and from universities coming to work here. The facilities are always open to inspection by the Government. How come no one made any of these allegations earlier? If we were carrying on 'secret' work, would we be so open to outsiders?"

Now, with the pesticide plant shut, whether Carbide will carry on with the R&D centre is an open question. Said one Carbide scientist: "The advantage of having the plant was that we were constantly forced to think in commercial terms. We were in constant touch with the production people there. Without it, we may be reduced to mere academics like numerous government research institutions—doing work without thought to applicability." Plagued both by uncertainty as well as controversy, some of the centre's employees are already talking in terms of seeking jobs elsewhere.

There are several materials and combinations of materials that might be used for an engine bearing depending upon the application.

BEARING CHARACTERISTICS

Apart from the basic function of reducing friction between a moving part of an engine — crankshaft or camshaft and its associated support surface, the engine bearings have to meet seven other characteristics — fatigue strength, conformability, embeddability, seizure resistance, corrosion resistance, temperature strength and thermal conductivity — characteristics which assume criticality depending upon the bearing application.

In our rugged operating conditions, F770 has been the most often specified material for bearings.

UNIQUE TRIMETAL OVERLAY

CLEVITE's F 770 – the steel-backed copper lead material has a unique CLEVITE patented process of a trimetallic overlay of lead, tin and copper co-deposited from a specially-designed bath by means of a unique plating system. The bearing properties of lead are significantly improved by the addition of just the right amount of tin for wear and corrosion resistance, and copper for fatigue strength. CLEVITE's research and field performance in millions of vehicles throughout the world have proved that this right overlay combination provides the strength of the heaviest duty bearing material without sacrificing the recognised surface action of lead-based babitt, so vital for successful bearing performance.

NICKEL BARRIER DAM

Yet another distinctive feature of this overlay construction is the nickel barrier dam, between the trimetallic overlay and the binary base material. This barrier prevents the tin migration from the lead-based layer even under most adverse operating conditions, prolonging the life of the bearings.

No wonder, F 770 is the specified material for Con-Rod and Main Bearings in Bajaj-Matador, Standard-20, Trekker, Mahindra CJ-500, FC-160, Hindustan J6, PAL, Ashok Leyland AL 0370, AL 0400 & AL 0680, Tata 1210D, 1210E, 1210 SE and 1312, MF 1035 and 245, International B275/444, Escorts Ford 3000, Cummins.

Plant at Hosur

A COMPLETE RANGE

Apart from F770, CLEVITE has a wide range of materials – with properties aptly matched to suit the applications – with the result that any manufacturers' specification can be met, like for instance F 151 – steel-backed recticular aluminium tin, which Mahindra specified for Peugeot XDP 4.90 and was successfully met by CLEVITE.

rent conditions, in English. THE EVACUATION

Tragic Farce

MORE than three weeks after the Bhopal catastrophe, official heads finally started to roll, the most prominent being Madhya Pradesh labour minister Shyam Sunder Patidar. Others axed included seven officials from his department. According to a government release, Patidar had in fact submitted his resignation on December 4 accepting moral responsibility for his department's failure, but Chief Minister Arjun Singh only accepted it after the records had been scrutinised.

What prompted the action was a report submitted by Dr S.Siddiqui, professor of chemistry at the Motilal Vigyan Mahavidyalaya (INDIA TODAY, December 31, 1984). Siddiqui had been appointed as inquiry officer on February 10, 1982, to examine the safety factor at the Union Carbide factory after the death of a worker on December 24, 1981. Siddiqui submitted his report on March 5, 1984, but nobody acted on it. Two officials have been suspended for not forwarding the Siddiqui report for a full seven months. The then deputy secretary, V.K. Pachpor, and under-secretary R.S. Tholia, found guilty of the same crime, are facing departmental inquiry. The services of Pachpor, employed after his retirement by the Madhya Pradesh State Agricultural Board, has been terminated. Labour Secretary Arun Kumar and Special Secretary H. Mishra have been asked to go on leave pending a decision. Both men came to know of Siddiqui's report in October 1984 but took no follow-up action. The axe also fell on C.P.Tyagi, chief inspector of factories, who stands accused of having renewed the Carbide factory licence annually without considering earlier safety lapses.

Official bungling, however, was hardly restricted to the period before the tragedy. The panicked exodus by nearly half the city's eight lakh inhabitants during 'Operation Faith', the government-sponsored effort to neutralise the rest of the MIC in the plant's storage tanks, turned out to be nothing less than a tragic farce.

Patidar: among the first to go

According to senior government and army officials, there was, in fact, no need for the panic since there were few dangers involved in the neutralisation of the remaining gas. If anything, the mass exodus was largely instigated by the chief minister himself who over-played the situation and also over-emphasised the risks involved in an attempt to get the maximum media mileage. In a dramatic piece of dialogue that would have done justice to a Bombay film script, Singh intoned: "It is one of the most crucial decisions I have been called upon to make but duty leaves me no choice. In such moments of supreme loneliness, nothing impels us more than one's faith in our creator who is the final arbiter of our destiny."

Chief Minister Arjun Singh

The mass exodus was largely instigated by the chief minister himself who greatly over-emphasised the risks to get maximum media mileage.

To add to the panic, the state Government ordered the closing down of all schools and colleges right in the middle of examinations. The result was total chaos as the city turned into a ghost town with even patients, however sick, blindly groping their way out of hospital beds to mingle with nurses and operating room assistants in a desperate bid to flee from the imaginary threat.

That it was imaginary was testified to by the problem-free neutralisation of the lethal gas. While Indian Air Force helicopters periodically sprayed the plant with a fine mist of water to neutralise any escaping gas, a huge, 15 feet high burlap fence was also erected all along the factory wall and kept wet. Other elaborate measures were also taken in addition, which, as the head of Operation Faith, S. Varadarajan, testily admitted, "may not even be necessary".

They obviously weren't. The Union Carbide staff restarted the plant, the MIC was piped into a 'charge pot' where it was mixed with several other chemicals to produce pesticides. Within a few days, the gas had been spent and the plant shut down again. But the citizens who started trickling back to Bhopal a few days later were bitter and disillusioned, not only with Union Carbide which remained the main villain of this heartrending piece, but also with the Arjun Singh Government for so heartlessly choosing to take advantage of a tragic event for pure political expediency.

American. On December 10, the state Government had declared its intention to file a suit on behalf of the victims within a week but its failure to do so even till December 27 led victims to rely on the American lawyers.

Where the matter rests legally in the US is being debated. The first question is whether American courts have the jurisdiction to decide on damages in an accident that has taken place in India. This is also linked to the question of whether and to what extent the liability of paying compensation rests on the parent company.

Reports from the US suggest that Union Carbide will try to challenge the jurisdiction of US courts to hear the cases, and try to shift them instead to Indian courts, which in keeping with past practice, usually award lower damages. More important, from the Carbide point of view, is the fact that there is no system of punitive damages in India. Substantial punitive damage awards in the US could wreck the company and its Indian subsidiary because its insurance does not cover punitive damages. K.V. Rathee, a Supreme Court advocate, who has handled such cases in Canada before, explained: "Punitive damages are no longer looked upon in the US as monstrous, but are awarded to vindicate wrongs arising from antisocial behaviour."

Whatever plea Union Carbide might finally take on jurisdiction, most Indian and American lawyers agree that US courts do, in fact, have jurisdiction in this case. "A parent or a holding company, is fully liable for the actions or inactions of the subsidiary company, even if the subsidiary is located outside the US. Legal action can be filed either inside or outside the US," said Rathee.

In the meantime, US courts will have to keep in mind a recent US Supreme Court opinion that the victims must get "meaningful relief". Lawyers representing the Bhopal victims have argued that the Indian legal system—slow and poorly equipped as it is for mass-tort litigation—would deprive the victims of "meaningful relief".

Even while its jurisdiction plea is pending, Union Carbide will try its best to reach an out-of-court settlement to pay compensation to the Bhopal victims. This again is to avoid paying punitive damages which may have to be awarded if the cases go to US courts. Mediation or arbitration, according to American mediation lawyer Robert E. Stein would be the best way to settle the question of compensation. Even in America, explained Stein, cases involving mass accidents "simply take too long and often seem designed to put money into lawyers pockets rather than provide prompt compensation for victims". Rathee however would like the Indian Government to file a suit on behalf of the victims in a US court, and also set up a body to supervise the distribution of any compensation that the US courts may award.

There is also the other matter of which lawyer will be held by the courts to actually represent the complainants. This question is particularly pertinent because several victims have given the power of attorney to more than one lawyer. There continues to be enormous confusion as well about how precisely the lawyers will seek compensation. Godha says that according to Coale's advise, the most sensible course would be to seek an out-of-court settlement before filing a suit and he has already reportedly sought a meeting with Warren Anderson.

RAGHU RAI

One of the American lawyers with victims outside the Carbide plant

Apart from individuals, Coale is also representing the Bhopal Municipal Corporation (BMC) for the losses and expense involved in the extra burden of work following the tragedy. Bhopal Mayor Dr R.K. Bisariya says that Coale has consented to claim US $ 6 million in damages for BMC and—without charge. (According to reports lawyers have been claiming fees ranging from 33.33 per cent and upwards of the claim received as their share.) Says Bisariya: "We have been advised that US courts are considerably more liberal in matters of compensation than Indian courts which is why we decided to go there. Coale was among the first available in Bhopal, he has a good reputation, and he has an associate here with whom we can keep in touch. So we thought, why not him?"

But among legal circles in Bhopal, there is tremendous suspicion about the foreign lawyers.

One of the most severe critics is Ladli Sharan Sinha, 59-year-old chairman of the Madhya Pradesh Congress(I) Committee's legal cell. Sinha has already filed 120 cases in the court of the district judge, Bhopal, and claims to have another 700 cases ready. Says Sinha: "In the first place, the exercise of taking these cases to the US will prove futile. Secondly, how can all these strangers be trusted? Who are they and what are their interests?"

Sinha is claiming Rs 205,000 for each victim: Rs 100,000 for mental agony and shock, Rs 100,000 for physical disability that may occur in future and Rs 5,000 for incapacity to work. In death cases, he says, the amount will be Rs 300,000. Sinha is convinced that Indian courts too are liberal and is going to press for interim relief of Rs 50,000 to each of the affected. His main grouse is the governmental delay in implementing one of its announcements earlier in December. In compensation cases, claims are severely limited in India because about 10 per cent of the total claim has to be deposited at the outset as court fees. The state Government had announced its intention to waive court fees in the case of those affected by MIC. It was an important step but Sinha says that "because of the delay in the issue of a gazette notification, the decision does not become effective, and the cases I have filed will get delayed".

In the midst of all the legal wrangling, which may last months, and probably years, it will be a time of disquiet for the affected thousands in Bhopal, as also for Union Carbide in the US, which is now arguing with its auditors not to qualify the company's financial report for 1984. An auditor's qualification is intended as a warning sign to investors that the company's financial statements are subject to adjustments, such as would have to be made in case the courts uphold the demand for damages worth billions of dollars.

MIZORAM

A Farewell to Arms

THE WORD Laldenga in Mizo means one born on a Sunday. But the maverick leader of the two-decade-old insurgency who goes by that name must have had much more than a one-day holiday in his mind as he boarded the flight for London at Palam last fortnight. He was, in all probability, looking forward to a permanent break from the bloody trek through the bush. And obviously his 600-odd followers in the jungle fastnesses of the Arakans in Burma and the Chittagong Hill Tracts in Bangladesh would be waiting just for the right kind of signal from him for a farewell to arms.

Going even by the flip-flop-flip tradition of the negotiations between the Mizo rebel leader and the Government during the past seven years, the optimism this time seemed based on firm ground. "The Mizo problem has basically been solved," said Laldenga before leaving for London to celebrate Christmas with his exiled family there, and mildly added the rider: "Only a few issues remain, and these are being referred to the prime minister." The veiled hint was that the "few issues" included some vexed questions, but that the Government had agreed to make concessions which could be announced only after the elections.

According to sources, Laldenga and his aides—chief of staff of the outlawed Mizo National Army (MNA), the self-styled brigadier-general Tawnluia, the Mizo National Front (MNF) and Thankima, member of the underground cabinet—have been able to extract the promise of statehood for Mizoram, which is at present a Union territory. There is also the offer of special safeguards for the Mizo language and people, amnesty and a resettlement bonanza for the underground men and, most important, there is the offer of chief ministership, a la Sheikh Abdullah in Jammu & Kashmir as soon as the agreement is finalised.

This, sources say, is the key to the whole issue. For years, Laldenga has baulked when presented with draft agreements that promised him everything but the chief ministership, on a platter, in spite of the fact that he had repeatedly offered to align with the Congress(I). Even if the Government wanted to make that last concession there was a stumbling block in the form of Brigadier Thenphunga Sailo and his Peoples Conference government. But the assembly election last June changed the picture as the Congress(I) came into power.

A few days before Laldenga's optimistic announcement, the Congress(I) Chief Minister Lalthanhawla had clearly stated that he would have no hesitation in stepping down to clear the way for Laldenga. But in Delhi, it seems, the Government is still not sure as to whether it would be wise to let Laldenga join the Congress(I) right away. Laldenga, in turn, has made concessions too. He is no longer insistent on a Jammu & Kashmir type status (read Article 370 of the Constitution). He has also dropped demands like the assimilation of vast forest reserves of the neighbouring states of Assam and Manipur, which are inhabited by Mizos or tribes akin to them, and which have formed part of the MNF's dream of a greater Mizoram.

BHAWAN SINGH

"The Mizo problem has basically been solved. Only a few issues remain, and these are being referred to the prime minister."

LALDENGA
Leader of the Mizo National Front

But if there are broad areas of agreement, there are also sharp points of disagreement that remain to be sorted out. Prominent among these are:

▶ The Government's insistence on giving the state governor special powers as in the case of Nagaland, where the governor has a special responsibility for the maintenance of law and order.

▶ The rebel demand that all those convicted for insurgent activity in the past should be brought under the ambit of the amnesty order.

▶ Laldenga's demand for the regularisation of trans-border trade between tribals living in Mizoram and those in the adjoining territories of Burma and Bangladesh.

Officers in New Delhi's South Block say a concession on any of these will be difficult, but the provision regarding the governor's special powers could still be toned down and a promise to take up the issue of border trade with the concerned governments could be a point of compromise. Said a senior official: "G. Parthasarathy has been dealing with Laldenga for long enough to know that what he really wants is power in his little fiefdom and a feeling that he has won. He really couldn't be too bothered about the constitutional niceties unless there are special provisions that stick out much too prominently."

With an agreement round the corner now, new questions are also being raised by many Mizos on the other side of the fence. This includes people like Brigadier Sailo and former district executive council chairman Bawichhuaka, who have been fighting the MNF in there own ways. Many of them fear reprisals. Said a former Peoples Conference minister: "Our worst fears have come true now. All along, as we fought the MNF, the undergrounds used to say 'let pu (Mizo for Mr) Laldenga come back. We'll sort you out.' That threat has become a reality now."

Even greater is the fear among the large ex-underground element which surrendered in the late 1970s following a split in the MNF ranks. This includes former MNA commander-in-chief Biakchhunga and Laldenga's one-time ADC and self-styled colonel Lalsangliana, who also happens to be a son of Brigadier Sailo.

But, while the Government will try to extract a firm promise of restraint on reprisals, there can be no stopping yet another, greater question from being raised in the weeks to come. How is it that a government which castigates opposition leaders for having truck with the Akalis, suddenly makes up with a man who ran a 20-year insurgency from foreign soil, causing a degree of bloodshed far greater than witnessed in Punjab?

Ripples of Fear

RAMINDAR SINGH

"If the Government wants to keep the Sikhs it must rehabilitate them without delay... We should not consider ourselves second class citizens... The answer lies in asserting ourselves in the mainstream."

ARJAN SINGH
retired air chief marshal

THE MODEST chemist shop near the main entrance to the Heavy Engineering Corporation (HEC) township near Ranchi is deserted and silent. It is also empty, looted of its contents, its shutters prised open. The vacant shelves are a stark reminder of the rampaging mob that descended on the township on November 1. A stone's throw away, owner Karambir Singh's home is now a smoke-blackened shell. It too is empty. Karambir, neighbours say, has taken his wife, son and parents away to Punjab.

Karambir and his family are indeed in Punjab, more than 900 km away. Squatting on the floor of a tiny room attached to the historic Dukh Niwaran gurudwara of Patiala, Karambir narrates a sorry story. A qualified pharmacist, Karambir and his family moved to Ranchi in 1960. His was the best chemist's shop in the locality, he says proudly, and life was good, till November 1 when the marauding mobs brought havoc to his doorstep. Nothing was spared—the shop, his home, the possessions inside including a television set and video recorder.

In desperation, Karambir moved to a relief camp but, determined to begin afresh, returned home on November 13. It was a futile move. "I was threatened by the same people who looted my shop," he recalls. "They said I should go away. We were stoned." The unkindest cut was the offer of a few hundred rupees in compensation for lakhs worth of damage. Karambir resents the remark of Ranchi magistrate Balbhadra Prasad Sinha who said the money wasn't meant to compensate him for his loss but only to "buy a handkerchief to wipe your tears". Karambir decided that he had had enough, and spent whatever money he had left to travel to Patiala.

Like Karambir, most of the refugees who have made their way to Punjab did not by and large want to abandon their homes and businesses. Like him, many of them tried to go back to their old lives after the November 1 attacks. And they too were frustrated. Like Raminder Singh, who returned to his home in Dera Gopipur in Himachal Pradesh after escaping to a relief camp. "The moment I reached, the local toughs threatened me," he says. Raminder had little faith in the administration, so he moved once again to Mohali in Punjab, a town on the outskirts of Chandigarh.

Karambir and Raminder are tragically typical of several thousand Sikh families who have been driven to Punjab to escape continuing harassment and intimidation in Uttar Pradesh, Delhi, Bihar and Himachal Pradesh. The numbers are still insignificant in comparison with the 7 million-odd Sikhs who live outside Punjab, but they are frighteningly large in the context of homes and localities left behind and the relief camps to which they have headed.

Jagteshwar Singh, who is in charge of the relief camp in Patiala's Dukh Niwaran gurudwara, says that the bulk of the 700 refugees there arrived after December 10, swelling quickly as the Lok Sabha elections drew near. The largest number arrived in Patiala on December 21 and 22. At Ludhiana, railway officials said that 100 to 150 Sikh families were arriving on an average every day in the first three weeks of December. Jagteshwar says that most of those that came to him complained of increasing intimidation as the election campaign hotted up. He repeats one slogan the Sikhs say they heard shouted at them: "Jeeten gay to looten gay, haaren gay to maaren gay" (We will loot if we win, we will beat you up if we lose).

The chairman of the Central Relief Committee in Ranchi, Lakhbir Singh, believes that rumours of impending violence which drove away so many families were deliberately floated to keep Sikhs away from the polling booths. After all, Ranchi has 35,000 Sikh voters, and their franchise could have made a difference.

To back up his allegation, Lakhbir brandishes a postcard that he and other prominent Ranchi Sikhs received allegedly from the South Chhotanagpur Youth Congress(I). The postcard misinterprets Rajiv Gandhi's speech in New Delhi on November 19 in which he said that the murder of Mrs Gandhi had to be avenged not by violence but by closing ranks and strengthening unity. The offending postcard advises its cadres to avenge the murder of Indira Gandhi by "finishing off the country's traitors".

THAT this was not a threat to be lightly dismissed was affirmed by Ranchi Commissioner N. P. Singh who took serious note of the postcard and sent off copies to Patna, requesting the state Government to take action against the offenders. Commissioner Singh says that other letters were also circulated demanding that Sikhs leave Ranchi before December 18, the day of Rajiv Gandhi's visit. "The timing was very ominous, so the deputy inspector general of police and I wrote to the state Government," he says.

Ranchi isn't by any means unique, and though precise numbers aren't available, there is already considerable difference between what the Government says and what others believe. The Punjab Government says that it has the names and addresses of about 20,000 Sikhs who have come into Punjab from other states. Most of them are from Delhi, Patna, Kanpur, Bareilly, Ranchi and numerous smaller towns. The Akali Dal, on the other hand, says that 40,000 refugees have arrived in Ludhiana alone. One intelligence estimate puts the state-wide figure at 40,000.

Whatever the number, the refugees are already a visible presence in the towns to which they have flocked such as Ludhiana, Jalandhar, Amritsar, Patiala and Ropar. Most of them are lodged in gurudwaras, which have been converted into temporary relief camps run with the help of voluntary agencies. Some of their inhabitants, those who suffered personal loss in the violence, still appear to be shell-shocked. Others have already begun to look for a new life: they are seeking jobs, keeping an eye out for a new shop or even pushing handcarts to make a living.

Inevitably, the stories that they have brought with them are increasing tension in an already charged atmosphere. As Jagteshwar Singh, in Patiala narrates his tales of the atrocities perpetrated against innocent Sikhs, villagers from the surrounding area who are supplying milk and vegetables to the camp shake their heads in disbelief and mutter "Wahe Guru". The stories will undoubtedly be retold a hundred times, and in all probability get exaggerated as they pass from mouth to mouth. The bitterness, instead of subsiding, will live on.

Understandably, the refugees have put the authorities in a tight corner. The Punjab Government, says Chief Secretary S.S. Dhanoa, "would not like to encourage Sikhs to move here. Our policy is to keep these people out, to ask the Governments of their states to look after them." He adds that those in need of help in pressing their claims for compensation and insurance are being helped.

The Government is understandably concerned that the trickle of refugees, if it isn't reversed, could easily become a deluge that would swamp the state and its prosperous economy. Dhanoa feels that for the majority of the refugees, the move to Punjab is only temporary. Sikhs started to come to Punjab only after electioneering started and "indications are that most of them will go back if nothing further happens". He has written letters asking the chief secretaries of the states from which they've come to ensure the security of their lives and property. Home Secretary N. N. Vohra feels that 80 per cent of the refugees will eventually go back.

The refugees themselves don't seem to think so. Asked if he would go back to Shahdara in Delhi from where he fled after the massacres of November 1 and 2, Santokh Singh shakes his head, muttering, "Toba, toba. I will earn my bread here." Kulwant Singh, a machinist in the ordnance factory in Kanpur, took a week's leave to come to Punjab, but is ready to abandon his secure job rather than return to the city where he saw three Sikh colleagues burned alive. Sixty-five-year-old Lakha Singh, who moved to Sheikhpura in Bihar's Monghyr district some 35 years ago to set up a small cloth shop, says: "I don't trust the people or the authorites any more." He has no intention of returning.

The refugee influx has already begun to force up property prices in parts of Punjab! There is now a brisk demand for shops and homes that went abegging for two years when extremist violence brought commercial activity to a virtual halt. Land prices in Chandigarh have risen 30 per cent in one month and over 100 plots and houses have already changed hands at these prices. Prosperous Sikh farmers from Haryana are among the buyers. "We have never done such business," says real estate agent Amarjit Singh Sethi. "I have sold 20 plots and houses in Chandigarh and Mohali in the last six weeks."

The price of agricultural land has also doubled and it is now selling for Rs 75,000 an acre in the area around Ludhiana. Land just outside the Ludhiana municipal limits was recently bought at this price by Sikhs coming from Ranchi, and in one instance 80 Sikh families have joined together to form a cooperative housing society on 3 acres outside Ludhiana. Each family will get a small two room apartment.

Predictably, some of the property changing hands belongs to Hindus who want to move out of Punjab. Hardev Singh, a Patiala property dealer, opens his register and rattles off the names of 51 persons, most of them Hindus, who have asked him to help them sell their land or homes.

Punjab Home Secretary N.N. Vohra accuses property dealers in Mohali of "scalping" outstate Sikhs. He points out that some landlords fell prey to the temptation of several months rent in advance only to find their premises locked up and deserted with no prospects of further rent payments.

There has also been a run on bank lockers with the arrival of refugees. Some 700 new lockers were rented out in Ludhiana alone in December. Some Sikhs came to reconnoitre hired lockers in anticipation of a move to Punjab. They've also opened bank accounts. Intelligence estimates say that at least Rs 1 crore has been sent to Ludhiana since the trouble began.

The Punjab Government isn't alone in wishing away the refugees. A sizeable section of Sikh opinion also feels that the answer to the problem does not lie in large numbers of Sikhs trooping off to Punjab. "The answer lies in asserting ourselves in the mainstream," says retired air chief marshal Arjan Singh. "We should not consider ourselves second class citizens." But he adds that if this is to come about and if the Government "wants to keep the Sikhs, it must rehabilitate them without delay," and punish those guilty of the crimes against them. "The Government has done nothing to arrest the culprits of the November violence," he adds.

The former air force chief isn't alone in voicing this opinion. Many others, both Sikh and Hindu, feel that the essence of the refugee problem cannot be tackled unless confidence is built up. In its absence, the only things being built up are barricades on gurudwaras in such diverse places as Calcutta, Patna, Ranchi and Kanpur. Applications for gun licences are pouring in by the hundreds. Ranchi Commissioner N.P. Singh feels that these requests are justified and he plans to issue them after the elections. He admits that the main obstacle in restoring Sikh confidence is their "lack of faith in the administration, primarily the police". Singh, a Rajput from Uttar Pradesh, addressed Sikh congregations in the main Ranchi gurudwara and sought forgiveness for the violence against the community. Along with the DIG, he took a vow before the assembled congregation that their blood would be shed before that of any Sikh.

But attitudes such as this are still rarely expressed, and as long as they remain the exception the refugee traffic is not likely to ebb.

The sour version as told by our competitors

Everyone knows that ICIM had the unfair advantage of being the first company to manufacture computers in India. And they pioneered all four generations.

With the kind of multinational support they've got, they can't help but make a whole range of mini and mainframe computers that are world-class and upgradeable.

Their software packages are tested and proved on installations worldwide. Big deal!

Their personnel are very experienced, having designed over 50 different systems. How can anybody design so many different systems? They must either have a very large, very talented staff, or have the oldest geniuses in the world working for them.

As a vulgar show of power, they've got 83 service centres fully equipped with spares, spread all over the country.

And they take disproportionate pride in being the only ones who can actually execute a Networking operation.

SRI LANKA

The Battle Within

PRESIDENT—and Commander-in-Chief of the Sri Lankan Army—J.R. Jayewardene, whose passion for military affairs makes books on the subject his favourite bedside reading, took his industries minister Cyril Mathew by complete surprise when he removed him from the Cabinet last fortnight. The pre-Christmas sneak attack on Jayewardene's most formidable cabinet dissident on the issue of the draft district and provincial council bill seemed to be perfectly timed. But eventually, mounting pressure from the majority Sinhala Buddhists—whose champion Mathew is —forced Jayewardene's Cabinet to drop the draft bill. Typically, though, the official explanation given was that the response of the Tamil United Liberation Front (TULF) had been negative. In Madras, TULF General-Secretary Appapillai Amirthalingam protested: "That's preposterous. Certainly we felt that the proposals left a lot to be desired. But that doesn't mean we are not prepared to talk."

Jayewardene's hand was evidently forced by the threat of a protest march by Buddhists, who felt the proposal contained too many concessions to the minority Tamils. Sirimavo Bandaranaike, whose civil rights have been suspended by the Jayewardene Government, did a volte face to discredit the very proposal she had earlier favoured. But Jayewardene had come under increasing pressure from both India and the US to find a political solution to the vexed problem of ethnic minorities. His dilemma now provides ironic amusement to those who see it as some kind of "retributive justice". In 1956, when the then prime minister S.W.R.D. Bandaranaike almost conceded Tamil regional autonomy in the famous Bandaranaike-Chelvanayagam pact, it was Jayewardene who managed to force its abrogation by organising a march of Buddhists. "Jayewardene is hoist with his own petard now. He was the one who courted trouble by inviting Buddhists to the all-party conference," remarked Amirthalingam.

Not many believe that Jayewardene's buckling in to pressure is a setback. "We are more determined than ever to fight for a separate Tamil Eelam state. The Sinhalese Government has shown itself in its true colours. All Tamils will now see beyond any doubt that there is no alternative to fighting for a separate state," says a source close to the militant Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam. But Amirthalingam cautions against such an extreme stand. "Guerrilla warfare, landmines and ambushes are all factors to reckon with only up to a point," says the TULF leader. "If the Sinhalese army mounts an all-out attack on the Tamils, it could be disastrous. For every handful of Sinhalese soldiers or policemen who are falling victim to terrorist attacks, hundreds of innocent Tamils are getting killed in return."

For Jayewardene at least, it was something of a defeat. For strategic reasons, he thought it fit to make the boldest tactical move of his political career in sacking Mathew. The former industries minister has not only been the most consistent and uncompromising champion of the Sinhala-Buddhist cause in the ruling United National Party (UNP), he is also the president of the party's powerful trade union federation. But Jayewardene evidently thought, after much deliberation, that it was worth making a martyr of Mathew if only to win approval with the international community. He calculated that the pressure for a political settlement could no longer be resisted without disastrous consequences, especially economic. A top presidential advisor, Dr Esmond Wickremasinghe has warned of "insurgency conditions" in the south of the country if prices continue to rise.

The recent visit of the US President's special envoy, General Vernon Walters may have been the clinching factor. The US has made it clear that a political settlement acceptable to the minority Tamils must precede any serious US statement on the fight against "residual terrorism". In this at least there is substantial and, to many Sri Lankans who expected an open-ended US comment, a surprising convergence of Indian and American approaches. In fact, there is a small minority of Sri Lankan analysts who believe that a parallel Indo-American exercise on the Sri Lankan crisis could be the first step in the widely predicted improvement in relations between India and the US.

There has also been pressure from the World Bank, Sri Lanka's all-important aid-giver and creditor. Only a negotiated settlement, goes the argument, can help restore stability and business confidence. But none of this stood up against the protests of the Buddhists both outside and even within Jayewardene's own party and cabinet. The movement against the draft proposals cuts across party lines, unifying disparate political forces including Mrs Bandaranaike's Sri Lanka Freedom Party, the Buddhist clergy, smaller opposition parties and even the ruling UNP dissident groups and partymen who had scores to settle with Jayewardene.

Sinhalese sentiment has been outraged at the killing of Sinhala soldiers and policemen by Tamil terrorists, and the attitude of the Sinhala middle class, the influential businessmen and petty traders has visibly hardened. Though every significant group renounces the idea of a military solution, the thought of a military victory is a comforting hope.

According to one point of view, Jayewardene did not expect much from the draft proposals anyway. It is believed that the President's capitulation has not lost him any of the ground he hoped to gain internationally—he will now be able to say with perfect sincerity that he did attempt a political settlement but it was not acceptable to the Tamils. Says Amirthalingam: "I had a hunch it was going to happen...the only hope for us is now India. We entered into negotiations with the Sri Lankan Government only because of India." Amirthalingam's party now banks on Rajiv Gandhi's promise that the policies of the late Mrs Gandhi would be followed on this issue. "Which means that India will continue to take an active interest in finding a quick solution to the ethnic problem in Sri Lanka," says Amirthalingam hopefully.

According to the Sri Lankan National Security Minister Lalith Athulathmudali, renewed efforts to resolve the issue will be made after the Indian general elections. But Athulathmudali himself has along with Prime Minister R. Premadasa characterised Mathew's sacking as a ritual sacrifice to an imperious and blood-thirsty "big-brother"—India. Whatever the merit of this combative statement, and whatever the worth of the draft proposal, the latest development on the ethnic issue in strife-torn Sri Lanka seems to preclude undue optimism.

FOOD FOR THOUGHT

SWRAJ Paul, whose bid to buy substantial shareholdings in two Indian companies suffered a serious setback following an adverse Bombay High Court judgement in November, now has a new option in case the Supreme Court upholds the Bombay judgement. Paul is thinking of the possibility of donating the shares he has paid for to a new society that will be devoted to "cleaning up Indian business". The London-based businessman calculates that the Indian companies involved can hardly refuse to register the shares, worth Rs 1 3 crore, if they are given to a local trust, and that the trust will act as a permanent watchdog and keep an eye on and expose malpractices by company managements. Paul is yet to take a final decision, and describes the proposed trust as a "thought" that has come to mind.

BIFURCATION

THE GOVERNMENT has revived a three-year-old proposal to divide the public sector Indian Telephone Industries (ITI) into two separate organisations, one comprising the southern units at Bangalore and Palghat, and the other being constituted by the units in the north, at Naini, Rae Bareli and the project in Gonda. The controversial move is based on the argument that the northern and southern wings of the company have not always pulled together, but senior company managers are opposed to a bifurcation.

The company, meanwhile, has been headless for six months since the last managing director resigned in June. The contenders for the top slot are K.P.P. Nambiar, chairman of the Kerala State Electronics Development Corporation (Keltron), and R.P. Subramanian, now acting managing director at ITI.

BUMPY TRAIL

THE AUTOMOBILE companies may be seen as a growth sector in Indian industry, but an analysis of 12 established companies in this sector shows a deteriorating sales and profit performance. Six of the 12 companies suffered a decline in net sales during their financial year that ended in 1983-84, while two others saw only a marginal rise in sales. The profitability picture is even bleaker, with eight companies suffering a drop in profits before tax and three others showing only a marginal improvement. Those suffering a drop in both sales and profits are Automobile Products of India, Ashok Leyland, Bajaj Tempo, Mopeds India, Premier Automobiles and Tata Engineering and Locomotive Company. Overall, the 12 companies saw sales rise by barely 4 per cent to Rs 2,046 crore, while profits before tax dropped almost 20 per cent to Rs 107.6 crore. Profits after tax dropped over 27 per cent to Rs 76 3 crore.

TELEVISION TURN AROUND

TELEVISION sets have been in short supply for months because of the rapid growth in the number of TV transmitters. Numerous manufacturers have as a result enjoyed waiting lists and even premia on the official prices of the sets. Suddenly, however, the shortage has given way to an easy market situation, and the prices of a number of sets have dropped by upto 15 per cent. Only one company still enjoys a waiting list, while several others have seen their waiting lists disappear almost overnight.

ABORTED MOVES

A CONCERTED move to form a new drug lobby, in addition to the three that exist already, has made little headway despite prolonged confabulations. Several Indian drug companies with a stake in the manufacture of Indian drugs had felt that the three industry associations representing the foreign drug companies, the wholly Indian-owned ones and small units were not speaking up in favour of Indian-owned bulk drug manufacturers at a time when the Government was framing a new policy for the drug industry. Companies like Ranbaxy Laboratories, Alembic Chemical Works, Sarabhai, Unichem, East India Pharmaceuticals and Cipla Pharmaceuticals have also wanted preferential treatment for wholly Indian companies vis-a-vis foreign-owned ones and therefore started talks on forming a new association. But differences arose when some of the participants insisted that all the members of the new body proposed would have to leave the existing associations. The majority is unwilling to do this, and only Cipla has so far quit the Indian Drug Manufacturers Association.

STEADY SLIDE

THE STOCK-markets in the country did poorly during 1984, with The Economic Times share index registering a drop from 286.7 in early January to 277.7 towards the end of December. This decline of over 3.1 per cent is in marked contrast to the rise in the index of over 20 per cent during

Chart by B.K. SHARMA

1983. In fact, the index was on the decline during most of 1984, dropping to a low of 259.4 at the end of May before beginning a gradual climb and peaking at around 282 in mid-October, but only to slide again. The closing weeks of the year saw a steady trend and if the election results are to the stock-markets liking there could be a pick-up in the new year.

As an architect I have always appreciated lines, form and basic design. Ranging all the way from what nature creates to what man designs.

And when I find aesthetics and performance come together I get a heady feeling of joy.

That's what the Vespa XE does to me. I read somewhere that it's aeronautically engineered along the lines of high speed aircraft. When I ride it I know I'm riding the result of decades of two-wheeler evolution.

My schedule is fairly hectic. Meeting new clients, supervising contractors and builders on site, browsing around the market for new building materials. But yet I keep aside a few hours every day for real work. Designing buildings.

And that brings me back to the Vespa XE. It incorporates excellence in design in every area.

It's a reminder. A constant challenge in design that keeps me on my toes.

INDUSTRIAL GROWTH

Independent Course

THERE is good news for the countries of the Third World. Most economists in the West are saying that the recession is over and things will start looking up in 1985. They have of course said this, or something like this, before, but one should not look a gift horse in the mouth, particularly when he is trooping in with glad tidings. A US newsmagazine has predicted that the US gross national product (GNP) will expand 2 per cent this quarter and then grow a healthy 3 to 4 per cent by the end of the year. Consumer confidence is apparently returning and the US Commerce Department said last week that November retail sales were up 1.8 per cent, the first such monthly increase since April. Industrial production is also up, in the United States as well as in Europe, while stocks of unsold goods remain lean.

This is cheerful news for Third World countries, for there is evidence that most developing countries depend for their growth on steadily expanding trade and capital inflows, both of which are closely related to the level of world economic activity. You only have to look at the growth pattern over the last 20 years or so to see how close the link is. If you take the industrial countries as a group, their rates of growth have been coming down steadily since 1960, from 5 per cent a year during 1960-73 to 2.8 per cent in 1973-79, and further down to 1.3 per cent in 1980 and a negative growth rate in 1982. For the developing countries as a whole, you have also more or less the same pattern, with one major exception, or rather two—India and China.

While the rates of growth all over the world were going down between 1960-73 and 1980, they were actually going up in India (as well as in China). In fact, they nearly doubled in India, from 3.6 per cent a year to 6.6 per cent. The point I am trying to make is that the fact that the recession is lifting in the industrial countries may have a bearing on the economies of other countries but not necessarily on that of India. India's is a unique economy, a largely autonomous one, which is only slightly affected by currents, favourable or otherwise, elsewhere in the world.

You only have to look at the growth figures during the last five years to realise this. They have been good years for India—though not as exceptional as the Government would like us to believe—with an average growth rate, taking good years with bad ones, of well over 5 per cent a year, while they were anything but good years for the industrial countries. It is true that growth did not come, not all of it anyway, from the country's own resources, and we had to go in for a huge borrowing from the International Monetary Fund as well as from private lenders.

Was it perhaps due to the fact that our exports were also booming? There is no evidence whatsoever for this. There is apparently no clear connection between growth and exports, no positive link anyway. If there is any connection at all, it is of a reverse kind, exports going up when the growth rate is low and vice-versa. In 1976-77, the GNP growth rate was only 0.8 per cent while exports went up by 27 per cent, something of a record. In the following year, the export rate fell sharply to 5 per cent while GNP went up by 8.8 per cent, also something of a record. The same pattern repeats itself year after year, pin-pointing the fact that the Indian economy is not overly dependent on foreign trade. This is what you expect of an autonomous and a self-reliant economy and the expectation is not belied by the figures.

The word 'autonomy' is V.S. Naipaul's. Writing in a Bombay magazine after Mrs Gandhi's assassination, Naipaul maintains that India is too large, too autonomous to collapse just like that. The economic organisation of the country is such that it can perpetuate itself. The same point is made by another student of the Indian scene, Robert Hardgrave Jr, whose controversial book, India Under Pressure made headlines in the press last week. In reviewing various aspects of India's political, social and economic fabric, Hardgrave says that over the past three decades, despite relatively low rates of growth, the Indian economy has acquired considerable muscle. It remains a half-filled vessel, bemoaned by those who see only poverty, inequality and disparity but applauded by those who see self-sufficiency in agriculture and industry and more Indians better off than they have ever been.

India's basic strength lies in the self-reliance of its economy, particularly the industrial economy, and anything that undercuts that strength would be not only immensely damaging to our stability as a nation but also to its growth prospects over the long run. One would not go so far as to maintain, as Naipaul does, that we have become autonomous, because autonomy by itself means nothing, and can be misleading. After all, India has been an autonomous economy for centuries with only marginal trading with the outside world, but that kind of low-level autonomy did not prevent us from going under when attacked. What we have now acquired is an autonomy at a much higher level of technology and management, and one with an inbuilt mechanism for self-perpetuation. As between growth and self-reliance we have deliberately chosen the latter and one does not have to rely on US and other experts to reassure ourselves that it was the right choice to make.

But just because it was the right choice during the first critical years of development need not mean that it is the right choice for all times. There is now considerable pressure on India from the outside as well as inside for shifting gear from autonomy to faster growth through foreign investment and heavy imports of new technology. Not a day passes without one foreign delegation or another calling at Udyog Bhavan and other higher reaches of the Government. Indian businessmen too are doing their bit and one of their leaders said last week that there was enough scope for borrowings abroad to the tune of US $5 billion (Rs 6,000 crore) instead of the current level of around one. All this is heady wine, but growth, like love, is a many-splendoured thing, and its cost is ultimately measured as much in social and political coin as the gross national product.

ECONOMY

Hoping for Change

WITH an overwhelming number of voters plumping for the Congress(I) and Rajiv Gandhi, the new government in New Delhi is not short of friends. But great expectations come close on the heels of great victories. And within hours of the Congress(I)'s election victory last fortnight, it was clear that while businessmen were optimistic in their mood about the new government, they were also pitching high their expectations of what the Government would do.

Industrialists, company executives and businessmen said they looked forward to more "pragmatic" government policies, an opening up of the economy, a frontal attack on corruption, a modernisation drive, lower taxes, the cutting of red tape, and much more. Asked for specific suggestions on what they would like the new government to do, they mentioned the need to vastly increase investment in housing, to allow the private sector a greater role in power generation, and a focusing of attention on the constraints posed by infrastructural bottlenecks.

"There is a direct link between government policy and economic prosperity," said Asit Kumar Mitra, managing director of the Calcutta Electric Supply Corporation. "Greater efficiency and productivity will save the country crores of rupees, and the Government must preach the gospel of work ethics." Praful Anubhai, managing director of Rustom Mills, expected the new government to "bring about major policy changes to boost business." Jahar Sengupta, chairman of Chloride India, felt "the Government must continue with the trend towards liberalisation of economic policy, specifically in the areas of industrial licensing, import policy and tax policies." Industrialist B.K. Birla said: "The new government must realise there can be no going back and it must be able to adopt policies for fulfilling the aspirations of the new generation." And Brahm Vasudeva, chairman of Pressure Cookers and Appliances, said: "We want a pretty rapid dismantling of controls and protection across the board. An industry which thrives on this kind of protection is not an industry."

Much of the expectation hinged on the person of the prime minister, and the hope that he would introduce new ideas and a fresh approach to economic problems. Said R.V.Ramani, managing director of Mettur Chemicals: "Rajiv has shown a lot of interest in industrialisation and modernisation, and he is sure to introduce a new system of working that we have not been used to before. And he has also developed political clout now." Added Dipak Roy, director of the tea broking firm J.Thomas and Company: "What the economy needs now is new ideas from Rajiv to give it fresh momentum."

Even in terms of economic priorities, many businessmen spoke the language of the Congress(I) election manifesto. N.Shankar, managing director of Chemicals and Plastics Ltd, said: "I expect Rajiv to accelerate the pace of development of communication facilities, telephones and television. These measures may initially be ad hoc, but even that will do a lot of good." And B.K. Birla highlighted the importance of housing: "The housing crisis can only be solved if the Government allows banks to advance long-term low-interest loans to the middle class." And indeed, the Congress(I) manifesto talks of setting up at least three more housing development finance corporations and giving a major thrust to housing programmes.

Many see in past initiatives taken by Rajiv Gandhi a pointer to the directions of future policy, and the most common reference is to the changes introduced in electronics and computers. Said Inderjit Singh, chief executive of Fusebase India Pvt Ltd, which makes cooking appliances and television sets: "The computer policy is an indication of the direction in which Rajiv will take the country, so one can expect further liberalisations." "Rajiv's pronouncements lead one to believe that he is not wedded to doctrines."

Chairman, EID Parry.

"The government can give the task of simplifying procedures to a management consultancy agency."

MANMOHAN SINGH
Chairman and Managing Director, Frick India.

Apoorva Shah, chairman of Gujarat Steel Tubes: "With Rajiv, one expects India to leap into 21st century technology." M.V. Arunachalam, chairman of EID Parry, said: "Rajiv's pronouncements to date lead one to believe that he is not wedded to doctrines, and that he realises there are limits to what the state can effectively and justifiably undertake."

There was also broad support for the notion that private experts should be called upon to improve government functioning. Manmohan Singh, chairman and managing director of Frick India, said: "The Government can give the task of simplifying procedures to a management consultancy agency, and government departments dealing with exports should be handled by people on deputation from the private sector. The United Kingdom has done this with some effect." Added Shankar of Chemicals and Plastics: "I hope Rajiv will induct capable people into government, not necessarily bureaucrats or politicians, but lawyers, tax experts, industrialists and others also." V.P. Punj, president of the Federation of Indian Export Organisations, spoke in a similar vein when he said: "We don't need relaxations in policy. What we need is a removal of unnecessary procedures." And Nani Palkhivala, chairman of the Associated Cement Companies, said: "We should have a meritocracy. We've been governed by mediocre people for too long."

Sikh businessmen, naturally, had a special point of view. And Manmohan Singh of Frick India said that while he and most Sikh businessmen will continue to invest outside Punjab, they expected justice from the Government. "The only thing the Sikhs want is that identifiable culprits who took part in the riots should be punished." But even other businessmen saw the prospect of stability as a major asset. Said Arvind Dalal, director of the Bombay stock exchange: "Whatever the policies Rajiv follows, at least we have stability—and this is the most important thing for a businessman."

IN THE final assessment, most businessmen however seem to expect what they would from any government: lower taxes, liberalisations, pragmatism, an easing of controls, and so on. The distinguishing feature now is an edge of real hope that at least some of all that will now come to pass, that a new man at the helm with ideas of his own might think their language.

Certainly, if the new government wants to move quickly in new directions, it has a body of expert opinion waiting for attention. A number of expert reports on tax reform are already with the Finance Ministry, another on black money will be submitted this month, and yet another on ways of replacing physical controls with fiscal ones is being readied. A shift away from a "dos and don'ts" approach to one that guides economic behaviour through differential taxes has also been recommended by the Reserve Bank of India Governor Manmohan Singh, while L.K.Jha has recommended still further liberalisation of controls on industry.

The best indication of the thinking of the Congress(I) under Rajiv Gandhi is, of course, the party's election manifesto. This, like all its predecessors, is full of a series of limitless commitments, but some stand out as being meant seriously. There is, for instance, the obvious intention to give a boost to housing activity, a repeated emphasis on improving rice productivity in the eastern region (seen by experts as an area that is already showing signs of a production spurt), stress on modernising industry and upgrading its general technological level, a promise to formulate a new policy to deal with industrial sickness, persistent references to the need to register a presence in sunrise industries like electronics and biotechnology, and a clear desire to modernise the educational system.

Oddly enough, there is no real reference to the need to radically rewrite tax policies, let alone the lowering of taxes. The only budgetary promise is to abolish the compulsory deposit scheme, which affects just four million income tax payers.

The key word through all this, however, is change. That is what the industrialists, executives and businessmen expect, that is what the party manifesto indicates, and that is what the new government will first be judged by.

DCM

Troubled Transition

DCM COMPANY shareholders' meetings can be quite boring. Even if a company chairman or managing director is bidding goodbye, the only distinguishing feature is a slight overlay of sentiment. This one, however, was indeed quite different.

Under a giant pandal erected to hold DCM's 96th annual general meeting, Chairman and Managing Director Bharat Ram announced that both he and younger brother Charat Ram, who is also managing director, would be laying down office in March. Bharat Ram then invited Charat Ram to make his farewell comments, and that was when a dispute that had till then been confined to family councils and the company's boardroom finally erupted in the open.

In a blistering attack on the period during which Bharat Ram had stewarded the company, Charat Ram said DCM had lost its earlier "velocity", that there was now a "crisis of confidence", that things had reached a stage when a freeze had been declared on all investments, that profits had stagnated despite a trebling of investments since 1970, and that the company's shareholders had not got the benefits that those of even sister companies had.

The long-standing dispute between the two brothers had been an open secret in the company for years. And it was equally well known that matters had come to a head after Charat Ram was forced to accept a board decision that he should relinquish office simultaneously with Bharat Ram (INDIA TODAY, November 15, 1984). But with the dispute out in the open at last, the shareholders now joined the fray.

For the next hour and more, it was a virtual free-for-all. One shareholder asked why Charat Ram was being forced to leave the company against his will, another alleged that the company had been forced to doctor its accounts to show even the modest level of profits declared in the profit and loss account, and a third launched a frontal attack on Bharat Ram himself. At the same time, another band of shareholders extolled Bharat Ram's services to the company, drew attention to his stature in the world of business, and proposed that he be conferred the honorary status of chairman emeritus—a move that eventually got the approval of the general body. No comparable status was proposed for Charat Ram.

But there was no getting away from the difficult situation faced by the company. The shareholders were told that one textile mill was closed, that another was being converted into a separate company so that it could be sold, and that a third would be closed and its land used to develop real estate complexes.

Vinay Bharat Ram

Bansi Dhar

A final decision on the precise powers of the two new managing directors is still to be taken by the board, and it remains to be seen whether the issue will be settled amicably.

The company's auditors chipped in with their own comments, telling the shareholders that no provisions had been made in the accounts for a number of liabilities and that the changing of accounting methods had inflated the profits after tax by Rs 1.33 crore to Rs 2.96 crore (on a turnover of Rs 502.6 crore). A similar change in accounting for depreciation last year had converted a financial loss into a profit for the year 1982-83

For all the dissension, however, the shareholders' meeting did not reflect two crucial disputes that had taken place behind closed doors. One concerned a move by the government-owned financial institutions, who hold more than 40 per cent of DCM's shares, to increase their representation on the DCM board from three to five. And the second involved a continuing dispute over the new management structure for the company.

DCM has a board strength of 14, of which three directors were due to come up for re-election this year. In October, the financial institutions indicated that they would like to avoid re-electing all the present directors, and sought to replace two of them with institutional nominees. This was specially significant in the context of London-based Swraj Paul's bid to buy shareholdings in DCM, and the help that the institutions had given him in a similar situation in Escorts.

But Bharat Ram was quick to lobby behind the scenes, and the institutions backed off, so that last fortnight's shareholders' meeting saw the routine re-election of the existing directors.

Interestingly enough, the institutions did not lend their approval to the succession plan in DCM, which envisages Joint Managing Director Bansi Dhar (nephew of the two present managing directors) taking over as chairman and senior managing director, and Vinay Bharat Ram (Bharat Ram's eldest son) moving up from deputy managing director to managing director. The institutions chose to remain neutral at all the board meetings which discussed the succession issue.

Also, despite the official announcement of the succession plan at the shareholders' meeting, things are far from settled. Bansi Dhar is holding out in favour of the principle that there should be only one man at the helm of a company. But it is still far from certain whether Vinay Bharat Ram will be asked to report to Bansi Dhar or directly to the board. The latter course would almost certainly weaken Bansi Dhar's ability to control the company, especially at a time when the board itself has been hand-picked over the years by Bharat Ram. Some company officials therefore forecast that dual control can only lead to continued dissensions of the kind that have existed between the outgoing managing directors.

A final decision on the precise powers of the two new managing directors is still to be taken by the board, and it remains to be seen if the issue will be settled amicably or whether it will continue to fester. But there seems little doubt that while DCM's shareholders have been told of a change at the top, the last word on the succession issue in northern India's biggest corporate giant has not yet been said. —T.N.NINAN

The Name Game

NEON lights in India have always been different from those in most other countries, spelling Amul cheese rather than Kraft, or Rajdoot motorcycles instead of Steyr-Puch. The last two years have seen a change—the advent of Rothmans cigarettes, for instance—but sweeping amendments now under official consideration could open the floodgates and allow the storming of the Indian market by companies using foreign brand names.

The committee of secretaries has already cleared the move to rewrite the law restricting the use of foreign brand names, and cabinet sanction could follow soon after the new government is sworn in. If that comes through, the present trickle of new foreign brand names could turn into a flood.

As word of the changes being considered leaked out last fortnight, industry responded in conflicting voices. Said the executive director of a scooter manufacturing company: "Foreign brand names in combination with that of the Indian collaborator should be allowed in order to encourage foreign companies to collaborate with Indian companies." And Kisan Mehta, president of McDowell & Co, argued that the entry of foreign brand names would help the Indian consumer. "Poor quality products will disappear from the market since the consumer will shift to brand-name products," he says.

On the other hand, a soft drinks manufacturer argued that a country could establish its industrial presence internationally only if it promoted and protected its own brand names. "No Indian soft drink manufacturer would have been able to sell his franchises abroad if Coca-Cola had continued to dominate the Indian market. The Japanese did not depend on foreign brand names when they were developing industrially. Instead, they developed their own, and today they are world leaders."

The Government has taken account of several arguments while proposing a more liberal policy. One of them, ironically enough, is the failure of existing laws to achieve the stated objectives. Foreign collaboration agreements have a standard clause prohibiting the use of the collaborating partner's brand name, but this is easily breached by using the names in tandem with the local one, as in the case of Hero-Honda or Maruti-Suzuki. In another instance, the Foreign Exchange Regulations Act (FERA) prohibits the use of foreign brand names, but allows them if no payment is made on this account. This is an effective loophole because payments for the use of the brand name can be disguised by padding them on to the price of imported raw materials. A third restrictive law is the Trade and Merchandising Marks Act (TMMA), under which the Government has often turned down applications for registering foreign brand names. But registration merely protects companies legally from infringement, they are not barred from using unregistered brand names. As an official of a multinational corporation said: "The TMMA was not designed to regulate foreign brand name use, and the Government has no clear-cut policy on this."

Internal government memos have put forward several other reasons for liberalising the policy on foreign trade marks. One is the fact that companies with long-standing overseas shareholdings were allowed to use their parent companies' brand names in India (as in the case of Cadbury, Nescafe and Exide) before any restrictive laws came into force, placing newer entrants with foreign collaborations at a competitive disadvantage. Another is the assessment that the Indian economy "has attained enough maturity to view foreign brand names without undue apprehension". A third is the claim that foreign brand names are required because they bring with them the foreign manufacturer's assurance of quality. And a fourth is the argument that restrictions on the use of foreign brand names have been an irritant in international economic relations, with the issue being raised at numerous joint commission meetings.

But those who see dangers in the relaxation of the policy dismiss these arguments as meaningless. Said a manufacturer of electric bulbs: "The bulbs that we sell and those sold by our multinational rivals often are made by the same producer; only the brand name is different. Where is the question of extra quality coming with a foreign brand name?" A hotelier asked: "Is the Maurya Sheraton a better hotel than the Taj because it has a foreign name tagged on?" And another industrialist said that if the problem was one of quality the solution lay in improving the standards and monitoring mechanisms of the Indian Standards Institution. "Are we saying that Indians are incapable of achieving quality without foreign supervision?" he asked.

The liberalisation of government policy, if it comes about, will also mean a reversal of an earlier process of gradually phasing out foreign brand names. Thus, Parker became Chelpark, Vespa became Bajaj and Mercedes Benz trucks became Tata trucks. Many of these were the result of foreign collaboration agreements expiring, and the current reversal of this Indianisation trend is similarly a by-product of the new rush for foreign collaborations. But an across-the-board liberalisation of the rules on the subject can only reduce much of Indian industry to subsidiary status, devoid of independent stature.

TOURISM

Downward Destination

AS AN industry highly susceptible to the vicissitudes of political change, tourism can be a dicey business at the best of times. India's luck had miraculously held as a burgeoning destination in Asia, till Mrs Gandhi's assassination in October-end put the clock backwards by a season. The riots in the capital, followed by the Bhopal gas leak and the hurly-burly of the elections have all had a cumulative effect on the business, with industry sources claiming that it is the worst-ever set-back in the quantum of business lost, worse than the country's years at war. While the major travel agencies and hotel chains have been busy registering cancellations in the past six weeks, the pessimists feel that another wave of violence anywhere in the country, could write off business prospects for the season of 1985-86.

Two major travel agencies and tour operators in the capital, Sita and Mercury, claim they have lost business to the tune of Rs 1 crore each since the first week of November. And nationwide hotel chains such as the Taj Group and Oberoi candidly admit that were it not for the influx of foreign media and business traffic, they would be hard pressed to tide over the loss. "The next 10 days, of poll results and formation of a stable government, are crucial," says Ravi Dubey, general manager of the Taj Mahal Hotel in New Delhi. "If there is instability of any kind, all trade efforts to resuscitate bookings will go for a complete toss." Inder Sharma, chairman, Sita World Travel sums up the situation: "All our clients abroad are waiting and watching till after the elections. And so are we."

Acknowledgement of the suddenly beleaguered fate of the industry comes from official quarters as well. Nitesh Sengupta, Director-General of Tourism concedes that in the immediate and bloody aftermath of the assassination, almost all foreign missions in New Delhi had advised their governments to discourage travellers to India and it was not till November 10, after repeated assurances from him and other departments of the Government, that they withdrew their warnings. "Tourism is an easily perishable commodity," he says, adding that while the foreign media swooped down to report the Delhi riots, no one has bothered much to explain the return to normalcy. "As a result, the magnitude of damage done is considerably greater than it was during the Sino-Indian or Indo-Pakistan wars."

PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

The number of foreign tourists dropped from 88,000 in November 1983 to 65,000 in the same month this year—a 26 per cent drop that could grow in the remaining months of the peak season.

NITESH SENGUPTA
Director-General, Tourism

According to his department's calculations, the number of foreign tourists dropped from 88,000 in November 1983 to 65,000 in the same month this year —a 26 per cent drop that could grow in the remaining months of the peak season, which lasts till March. This has come as a rude shock to an industry that was gearing itself for one of its best seasons ever: at the 18th world congress of the Universal Federation of Travel Agents' Association (UFTAA) held in New Delhi in October, India was unanimously slated as a major tourist destination, with the release of major television serials filmed here and a steady picture of economic growth promoting the country's image. Much of that, however, has come to naught.

Last fortnight, as leading Indian tour operators were rushing overseas to try and reclaim cancelled business, there were ready indicators available on the extent to which business had been hurt. The highly-publicised once-a-week luxury train, "Palace on Wheels", run jointly by the Northern Railway and Rajasthan Tourism, left New Delhi with seven passengers aboard its 98 royal berths. And at the city's premier hotel, the Taj Mahal, the number of room nights booked by foreign tour groups was less than halved, from 1,650 in November 1983 to 770 in November 1984. At Taj Mahal's sister hotel, the 447-roomed Taj Palace which conducts major business in hosting conventions and exhibitions, room nights were down from 3,500 to 1,500 for the same period. The future looked so bleak that the group's Vice-President, Camellia Panjabi, was mobilising a group of foreign journalists in London to travel to India and see for themselves how normal things were.

Inder Sharma of Sita World Travel, who collated a loss of nearly a crore of rupees (annual turnover last year: Rs 34 crore), was also busy defending the country's image in the foreign media. His chief grouse was against New Delhi-based foreign news agencies who, other than repeating disaster stories about India, frequently used the New Delhi dateline for putting out stories about the political instability in neighbouring countries like Afghanistan and Sri Lanka. "The fact that the lay reader abroad sees 'New Delhi' as a dateline, even when the news is about another country, aggravates his bias against visiting," he said irately.

As badly hit as the tour operators were the resort or palace hotels that survive on tour groups during the winter months for up to 80 per cent of their business. As resorts like Goa and Puri, or the palace hotels in Rajasthan, emptied out after the assassination, there was little hope that they would see tour groups jostling for accommodation this winter. And though the Directorate of Tourism has predicted at least a marginal recovery in the new year, Director-General Sengupta was voicing the entire industry's lament when he said: "Just when we were soaring high, this drop has come as something of a body blow. We only hope its effects will be contained in the near future."

Just when everyone thinks there is space for no more, you discover something new on the horizon.

Ancient civilizations were sure that there were only six planets in our solar system: Mercury, Venus, Earth, Mars, Jupiter and Saturn.

William Herschel was not convinced.

He weighed the evidence. Investigated all claims. Made his own calculations. And in 1781 discovered the planet Uranus, an ever-present truth that at last saw the light of day.

Does this sound familiar today?

The truth is plain to see for those who care to look.

DUNLOP INDIA

Containing the Coup

FOR WEEKS industrialist R.P. Goenka had been waiting for word from London, making periodic trips to the Dunlop Holdings headquarters, monitoring reports of a change in the top management of the British Company, keeping track of the persistent lobbying by merchant bankers on behalf of rival industrialists. There were times when he came close to giving up, but last fortnight the catch was finally in the bag. And Goenka's younger son Sanjiv, barely 25, moved in as the deputy managing director of Dunlop India Ltd, the tyre monolith that ranks 11th in the country's corporate hierarchy with sales last year of Rs 320 crore.

The biggest coup in India's corporate history was finally official. But there were also indications that Goenka had been forced to change strategy midway in order to land the catch. The 54-year-old industrialist had initially planned to buy a small stake in Dunlop India for himself, get two non-resident Indian friends (one in West Asia and the other in the Far East) to acquire some more of Dunlop Holdings' 40 per cent stake in Dunlop India, and move in to take control. But the announcement last fortnight made it clear that there was no one from the Far East involved, and that the only shares to change hands were acquired by Sanjiv Goenka and the West Asian non-resident, Manohar R.Chhabria, who in an unexpected move became the chairman of the company. Dunlop Holdings continued to hold 30 per cent of the Indian company's shares.

There was no explanation coming on the reason for this new game plan, but one reason for the delay in effecting the change of control was the fact that Dunlop Holdings had wanted to unload its full shareholding in Dunlop India in order to raise badly needed funds. However, Goenka's proposal meant that the British company would have to continue holding on to most of its shares. As Goenka told INDIA TODAY during the weeks he spent tensely waiting for a decision from London: "The problem is that I am not trying to buy out Dunlop Holdings shares, only to buy into Dunlop India's management."

That sounded suspiciously like Goenka's earlier acquisition of Ceat Tyres, where he bought only 11 per cent of the Italian parent company's 51 per cent shareholding. A subsequent bid to buy out the remaining Italian shareholding was, however, negatived by the Government. A similar attempt may now be made in Dunlop, but Goenka was tightlipped about future plans.

Sanjiv Goenka

M.R. Chhabria

Manohar Chhabria said he would not be an ornamental chairman, but Sanjiv Goenkaas deputy managing director will look after Dunlop's day-to-day operations.

Meanwhile, he is sharing the spotlight at the moment with Chhabria, a little-known 38-year-old businessman whose chief claim to fame so far has been his association with Sony of Japan. Having started life selling consumer electronics goods in his family shop in Bombay, Chhabria had little to his name when he arrived in Dubai 10 years ago. But he persuaded Sony to let him market its products in West Asia, grabbed 40 per cent of the market through his Jumbo Electronics, and soon persuaded Sony to collaborate with him in setting up a unit for taping Hindi films on video at the Santa Cruz Electronics Export Processing Zone. Last year, he set up another company, Orson Electronics, to manufacture television sets using Sony technology, and he expects the company's turnover this year to hit Rs 20 crore. Dunlop is for him the biggest catch yet.

Chhabria was in Calcutta last fortnight to take over as Dunlop chairman, replacing J.E.S. Hammond who stays on as managing director. Losing no time, Chhabria organised a grand puja in Dunlop's plush headquarters on Calcutta's Mirza Ghalib Street, specially bringing in four priests from Varanasi. And scotching any rumours that Dunlop would henceforth be run by the Goenkas while he remained a figurehead chairman, Chhabria said before he returned to his Dubai base: "It is not my intention to be an ornamental chairman".

How Chhabria will play more than an ornamental role from his base thousands of miles away is not clear, especially when R.P. Goenka had made it clear to INDIA TODAY in the past that he was acquiring Dunlop in order to give son Sanjiv "a metropolitan base" in the same way that the Ceat takeover had pitchforked older son Harsh Vardhan into corporate prominence. Managing Director Hammond also sees Sanjiv Goenka as the man who "will look after current operations, leaving me free to tackle the long term interests of the company."

What changes will the new team bring about in Dunlop? The Goenkas' immediate objective is to pull the company out of a slide since both sales and profits have been falling. The Goenkas feel that the company "was attuned to the culture of a sellers' market and could not change when the tyre market was transformed after 1977 into a buyers' market". There is likely to be a trimming of considerable fat in the company, and Sanjiv Goenka talks of making fresh investments in the huge Sahagunj factory outside Calcutta. Technology from Sumitomo (with which Ceat has a new collaboration) may be used to revamp the rubber products operations, and a diversification into steel cord conveyor belts is also on the cards. Finally, if the Goenka record in Ceat is anything to go by, they are likely to take firm control of the company's purchase operations by bringing in people from outside.

In many senses, therefore, the Dunlop story is just beginning. How exactly will the new Goenka-Chhabria partnership work? How successful will the Goenkas be in pulling Dunlop out of the rut? Will they face any problems in getting government approval for the change of share ownership? And will they finally acquire the 30 per cent shares that remain with Dunlop Holdings? As Dunlop turns the corner with a new driver at the wheel, no immediate answers are in clear sight.

NON-RESIDENT INVESTMENT

Paving the Way

A NEW company in Andhra Pradesh last fortnight began turning out high-grade bimetal steel strips and industrial blades for the cutting tools industry. In Kerala, the first of many motels will open its doors early this year on the Trivandrum-Quilon road. In Gujarat, Kumar Lamba from the United States is setting up a chlor-alkali plant using the latest membrane technology. And Dharm Ramiya from the United Kingdom has helped induct fresh technology to manufacture transceivers.

These are the latest in a series of ventures that state governments across the country hope will reshape their industrial maps, create new jobs and bring in new technology; and they are the fruits of an intensifying drive by the state governments to tap a new source of money, technology and enterprise: the much-touted non-resident Indian.

The money involved could be big. A private study three years ago showed that the total assets of Gujaratis living abroad amounted to over Rs 8,000 crore. Most of that may not be available for investment in India, but even a small percentage would be a handsome sum. So the eagerness of state governments is understandable. Andhra Pradesh Chief Minister N.T. Rama Rao made a whistle-stop tour of the United States last June in quest of funds and entrepreneurs. His West Bengal counterpart, Jyoti Basu, headed for the UK and the US two months later on a similar mission. And no fewer than 11 of Kerala's 19 ministers have been to the Gulf. Gujarat's Finance Minister Sanat Mehta has also pitched in for his state. And at least three official delegations have in recent years arrived at the non-resident Indian's doorstep urging him to invest back home.

Bimetallic Steels and Alloys Ltd factory in Andhra Pradesh

A. PRABHAKAR RAO

The bait held out is attractive: single-window clearance so that tiresome formalities are dispensed with as far as the bureaucratic machinery allows, land for factories and homes (often at concessional prices), separate industrial estates earmarked exclusively for non-residents, and even help with such problems as admission to English-medium schools, telephone, telex and expeditious cooking gas connections.

Andhra Pradesh has already started a new corporation for the purpose: the Andhra Pradesh State Non-Resident Indian Investment Corporation (ANRICH), and Kerala is now talking of floating an offshore investment company in a tax haven like the Channel Islands or the Bahamas, with the long-term objective being to provide venture capital for projects in the state.

The response has varied from the gratifying to the ho-hum. Haryana says it has already issued 400 letters of intent for projects mooted by non-residents. Gujarat has moved further up the road, with 302 projects already having been set up over the last six years, with a total capital investment of a little over Rs 150 crore. By last June the state Government had received 1,661 enquiries from Indians abroad, more than half of them living in the US and the UK.

The most spectacular success of the drive so far has been in Andhra Pradesh, where 30 overseas investors have banded together with Hyderabad promoter V. Chakrapani to put on the drawing boards a million-tonne cement plant that will cost Rs 130 crore. Chakrapani also heads Bimetallic Steels and Alloys Ltd, the high-grade steel strips and industrial blades company that went into production in the state last fortnight.

The state chief minister's canvassing tour in mid-1984 drew 176 responses from potential investors. Some 15 of them have already applied for industrial licences, and a dozen non-resident investors have so far committed themselves to chipping in with Rs 10 crore for projects that have a total cost of Rs 90 crore. Five projects have already started production of mini-computers, floppy disk drives, watch components, drugs and colour television sets.

Even unhappy West Bengal, shunned by most domestic entrepreneurs, has got a reasonable response from Indians abroad. S. Bandopadhyaya, executive director of the West Bengal Industries Development Corporation, says: "We have received a few dozen enquiries from Indians in the UK and the US, and these are now being processed." Two US-based entrepreneurs who want to turn out computer software in Bengal explain that the state's low wage levels will keep down costs, lending their software a competitive edge in the American market.

Among the less successful states is Kerala, with the state's militant labour force deterring potential entrepreneurs. Says P.J. Koshy, chairman and managing director of the Bombay-based Reunion Engineering: "I have factories in India and construction contracts in West Asia, but being a Malayalee it was always my dream to start something really big in Kerala. But the industrial and political climate there is gloomy." Many Gulf-based Malayalees in fact prefer to invest in other states that are wooing non-residents. Explains Chandran Panakkal, who used to work for an Abu Dhabi oil company but is now leading a clutch of investors setting up a cola bottling plant and a composite spinning mill in Andhra Pradesh: "Some of us find it safer to invest outside Kerala because of the labour problems there."

Even private companies have met with some success in selling shares and debentures to non-residents in West Asia and elsewhere, the two most notable cases being the Tata Engineering and Locomotive Company and the Gujarat Narmada Valley Fertiliser Corporation. And foreign banks like Grindlays have spent considerable time and effort trying to facilitate an easier flow of funds and set up projects.

Success in this drive for tapping funds from what was virgin territory till a few years ago has hinged on what exactly the states have to offer, and how well they offer it. Andhra Pradesh, for instance, has driven home the plentiful availability of electricity in the state, with special industrial estates being set up only for non-residents. Says ANRICH General Manager K. Vidyasagar: "Andhra Pradesh is emerging as the most favourable place for potential investors, because the industrial climate is better than elsewhere, and power is available in plenty." So, despite the fact that 17 clearances have to be obtained before an entrepreneur can set up his factory, the investors have been coming through ANRICH doors.

GUJARAT, in comparison, has hinged its formidable effort so far on starting before the others, and then providing single-window clearance through the Industrial Extension Bureau, which also attends to the entrepreneur's personal problems regarding school admissions, housing and so on. The state has also capitalised on its peaceful labour scene to sell itself as an ideal business location. Officials in the state certainly see the effort as worth the trouble. Says Jay Narayan Vyas, executive director of the Industrial Extension Bureau: "India spends crores of rupees every year trying to get advanced technology. Instead, it is worthwhile taking steps to attract non-resident Indians to set up units in India."

(From top) Rama Rao, Basu and Sanat Mehta: the strong suitors

M. RANJITH RAO

RAMESH MENON

West Bengal may not be quite as successful in its wooing of overseas Indians, despite the labour cost advantages. Only two of the enquiries received by the state Government so far have reached the stage of project work. Explains a government official: "It is too early to say when the actual processing will be completed. These things take time here, particularly since we have to get back time and again to those who want to invest, and clarify various points."

Kerala has been even more unlucky. A project promoted by the state Government with non-resident funds during the 70s has done poorly for a variety of reasons. Carbon and Chemicals Ltd shares are now quoted below par. With non-residents understandably chary of fresh industrial commitments, the state Government has allowed them to enter areas barred by other states: cinema theatres, hotels, hospitals, tourist taxis and real estate. Also on the anvil is an offshore investment trust that will manage share and debenture portfolios apart from short-term investments in deposits and inter-corporate funds. The state Government hopes to use the money tapped as venture capital for projects in Kerala and the state's industry minister talks of offering fresh concessions to woo the five lakh Malayalees working in the Gulf. But even these may not deliver the expected results. For one thing, the investment trust planned by the state Government will have to compete with similar bodies planned by at least one business house and a bank. And also, as K.V.Shamsudeen, president of the Gulf Malayalee Forum at Sharjah, says: "How can a cook from Kerala settled in the Gulf understand the basics of starting computer peripherals or carburettor manufacture?"

West Bengal too is making a bid to iron out some of the problems that non-resident entrepreneurs might face. Anxious to get the industrial infrastructure ready before issuing the green signal, the state Government is looking around for suitable land that can be offered because there is little spare land available outside the electronics complex in Salt Lake and the Siliguri industrial estate.

But if land and other amenities are available and if the potential investor can be offered single-point clearance of his project proposal, the years ahead should see still more steel strips, chlor-alkali and transceiver plants, plus motel chains and computer software undertakings.

ANUBHAI SHAH

Jobless textile workers having a free meal at a temple: untold deprivation

TEXTILE WORKERS

A Threadbare Existence

SWALLOWING their pride, they queue up in hundreds outside the Chakudia Mahadev temple, run by a private trust, for what probably is their only daily meal—a free lunch shared with beggars. For months they have lived off their savings and drawn liberally on provident fund accounts. But with bank balances down to a few rupees, they are now face to face with starvation.

The daily food line in Ahmedabad is the denouement of an enormous human tragedy being played out on Gujarat's industrial stage. The state's textile industry has been pushed into bankruptcy by mounting competition from cheaper powerloom products and a shift in demand away from cotton textiles. Twenty-four textile mills have folded up in Gujarat over the last two years, 16 of them in Ahmedabad alone, throwing 49,000 workers on the streets. While hundreds of jobless workers have left for their homes in the backward districts of Uttar Pradesh, Bihar and Madhya Pradesh after hanging around in vain for the mills to reopen, many more have stayed behind to face united deprivation. Says Karim Allahbax, who used to work in Ahmedabad Cotton Mills: "Only we, the helpless workers, have lost out. The millowners have not lost anything. They still move around in cars, and do not think of our hunger."

More than a dozen of the more desperate jobless workers have committed suicide in the last year. All of them were the only working members of very poor families, and had half-a-dozen dependants. Recalls a tearful Shersingh Sisodia, whose son Sajjan Singh committed suicide last February: "There was a lot of tension in the house. For many days we did not have enough provisions for a square meal a day. There were unnecessary fights between members of the family. After one such quarrel about the lack of cereals for lunch, my son killed himself by jumping into a well."

Those grimly clinging on to life eke out an existence through petty trade, take on odd jobs like pulling carts or working as headloaders, or just tighten their belts. Kalidas, who has been unemployed for the last two years, says stoically: "I could make Rs 4 a day by operating an amber charka, but I would then need to eat four chapattis. Now I need only one to stay alive." Adds Bhavanbhai, whose 15 dependants make his current earning of Rs 20 a day seem a trifle: "Sometimes we eat only once a day. We have to eat chapattis with raw onions or garlic chutney. Vegetables are out of the question."

Jobs are not easy to come by, and employers have started dictating terms to the former textile workers. Since so many are out of work, wage levels have plummeted. Ramanbhai Parmar, 28, who used to earn Rs 45 a day at Monogram Mills now does the same job at a powerloom unit at Naroda for just Rs 8. Says an emaciated Jaibunisha Ibrahim, who started rolling agarbattis after her husband Mehboob lost his job: "My employer pays me only Rs 3 for rolling 1,000 agarbattis, but it is a lot of money nowadays. It is better than starving to death."

Most of the workers have taken to petty trade. Selling sweets, footwear, bangles, agarbattis or pan nets them a profit of about Rs 10 to Rs 15 a day. Notes Parmabhai Rohit, who used to earn Rs 45 a day before the mill he worked for closed two-and-a-half years ago: "I sell jaggery and earn a profit of around Rs 15. But I am better off than thousands of others who do not have even the initial investment needed for this kind of business." Nor do the less fortunate have any hope of getting loans now. For banks have become chary of granting loans to jobless workers since they cannot repay the loans. A

Bapunagar bank official points out that bank funds are so hard to come by that the ubiquitous middleman has entered the picture, with touts charging fat commissions to secure loans.

The workers live in shacks at Rakhial, Gomtipur, Sarangpur and other labour localities in Ahmedabad. Many have not paid rent for months even though the rents are usually less than Rs 50 as they have been living there for decades. Says Ganesh Singh, who used to work at Ahmedabad Cotton Mills: "My rent is Rs 50, but I have not paid it for many months. The landlord knows that we struggle now just to eat one square meal a day, but one day he will throw us out."

The crisis that has gripped the city is also clearly worrying traders and industrialists in the state. The thousands of workers who are affected could be a potential cause of social unrest and economic turmoil. Says Deepak Navnital, president of the Ahmedabad Textile Mills' Association and managing director of Maneklal Harilal Mills: "The closure of so many mills can have disastrous consequences. The only hope lies in the Government restarting the closed mills."

LATE last June, the Madhavsinh Solanki Government did make a seemingly determined bid to contain what could become an explosive situation. It exerted pressure on the Industrial Development Bank of India and the nationalised banks to put up Rs 8 crore to get eight mills working again. The workers' hopes were raised by government drumbeating, heralded by the appointment of dynamic bureaucrat H.K. Khan as additional chief secretary in charge of textiles. However, their expectations were soon dashed. The eight reopened mills now function with a skeleton staff, and only 3,800 of the total 16,000 workers have been absorbed.

The state's textile workers have always been a docile workforce. There has been no major strike in the industry in the last 100 years, though Ahmedabad alone has a labour strength of 1.5 lakh working in its 60 textile mills. Most workers were till recently on the rolls of the Textile Labour Association (TLA) which is wedded to the Gandhian path of peaceful negotiation. And while there has been no upsurge in violence or crime in the state as a result of their plight, labour militancy has reared its head, with workers demanding that the TLA adopt a stiffer stand. TLA President Arvind Buch has come under fire from his union's members for not taking to the streets. The upshot is desertions from union ranks. In the last 10 months TLA membership has dwindled from 1.31 lakh to 85,000. Says Buch: "We cannot stop mills from closing. Nor can we check malpractices like millowners disposing of printed cloth and raw materials before they down their shutters. We can only suggest to the Government that it nationalise the industry." Underlining the TLA's helplessness, he adds: "We do not want to be violent. With such a huge workforce we can easily cause havoc. But since we are peaceful, no one listens to us."

a temporary worker in a powerloom unit

The initial beneficiary of the desertions from the TLA was the Bharatiya Janata Party's (BJP) newly formed union, Bharatiya Kamdar Parishad (BKP). A few months ago, crowds of workers used to gather to hear BJP leaders, who are more vocal and aggressive than the TLA top brass. But BKP activity has slowed down and workers suspect that the lull is due to the elections since millowners are major donors of funds. A pall of distrust hangs over all the labour localities. Says Danabhai, an unemployed worker: "Everyone has let us down. Millowners, TLA, the Government and the opposition parties—all have used us."

The big question for the thousands like Danabhai is whether their plight will improve, or whether others will join their ranks as still more sick mills close shop. The Solanki Government on its part has in a fresh fire-fighting move asked the banks to lend mills in the sick bay another Rs 11.50 crore to ensure that they also will not down their shutters. Ruling out government take-over of non-viable closed mills, Additional Chief Secretary H.K. Khan says that the state Government is involved in the process of restructuring and modernising them but they can only get back to business if labour strength is pruned. The surplus belonging to the mills may also be sold, and the money pumped into the mills to make them viable.

The latest silver lining on the clouded textile labour horizon is Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's promise to try and solve the textile crisis. Last fortnight, Gandhi told a lakh-strong crowd at Ahmedabad: "As soon as the elections are over, we will try to solve the textile crisis. This is not just an Ahmedabad problem, as textile mills are shutting down all over India." But till a new government settles down to the business of running the country, the unemployed textile workers will have to line up for their food dole, and make do on the bottom line of existence.

INDIRA GANDHI MEMORIAL FUND

INDIRA GANDHI has joined the luminous band of martyrs whose life will remain an inspiration to humankind. Hundreds of millions of people in India and the world over have mourned Indira Gandhi and paid her their homage of love. Besides being a symbol of India's freedom, unity and strength, she was a passionate proponent of reconciliation and peace among nations and of a better life for the deprived of all lands.

The best monuments to the great are their own work. The hope and confidence that Indira Gandhi instilled into the people of India, specially the poor and the weak, the self-reliance which she imparted to its agriculture, industry and science and the capacity which the country has generated under her watchful guidance to overcome the age-old problems of poverty and social injustice—these constitute the collective memorial to her.

Her concern, however, went beyond India. Like her father, Jawaharlal Nehru, she spoke for the entire human community and was the herald of a better world order. As Prime Minister of India and latterly as Chairperson of the Non-Aligned Movement, she constantly pleaded for a saner and trusting world, a world which would discard nuclear weapons, and in which wealth and technological skills would serve the needy rather than the powerful.

Indira Gandhi's energy and dedication were legendary. She had an astonishingly wide range of interests: the revitalisation of our entire cultural heritage; the flowering of music, dance, architecture and rural and tribal arts and traditions; the amelioration of the handicapped, the afflicted and the aged; the welfare of women and children; conservation of nature and wildlife; promotion of sport, mountaineering and the spirit of adventure—there was not a cause or a challenge which did not evoke her support. Scientists, philosophers and artistes from many countries regarded her as a friend and ally.

She believed in the wholeness of life and the interrelationship of forces. That is what made her a champion of the all-round growth of the human personality. Her vision even of economic development was a wider one. Material well-being, she pointed out, must be accompanied by a blossoming of inner resources. She wanted the expanding knowledge of the outer world to give us greater power to look within ourselves.

She often said that she was not worried how history assessed her, as long as she had the satisfaction of having done her chosen work to the best of her ability. In her last public speech on the evening before her assassination she declared that every drop of her blood would invigorate the nation.

The building of a united, creative and caring India and a peaceful and compassionate world is the duty which Indira Gandhi has enjoined on us all. To carry forward the work which she started and to support the many causes which were dear to her, it has been felt that an Indira Gandhi Memorial Fund be created. One of its functions will be to preserve Indira Gandhi's writings and memorabilia for the benefit of posterity. It is also important that the various moves to commemorate Indira Gandhi are co-ordinated.

Friends and admirers of Shrimati Indira Gandhi spread over India and the world who are desirous of contributing to the Indira Gandhi Memorial Fund may kindly send their remittances to any branch of the State Bank of India, where a separate account is being opened. Government is being approached to provide tax relief to contributors.

Even the smallest contribution will be welcome. What matters is that the fund should be a people's fund, drawing support from all classes of people in India and abroad.

We must build a memorial worthy of a person whose pride in India and whose love for humankind were unbounded.

WHILE wholesale prices remained more or less stationary, inflation in consumer prices was above trend. Money supply recorded a sharp spurt owing to expansion of credit to the Government, but bank credit to firms was sluggish. The trade gap narrowed, leading to net accumulation of foreign exchange reserves.

All data are seasonally adjusted. Current trends are computed on the basis of the last six months data, to which a regression is fitted.

Wholesale prices remained fairly stable last fortnight recording a marginal increase of 0.2 per cent due to a rise in the price of manufactures.

Consumer prices were up by half per cent last month, slightly above trend, with the pace accelerating compared to the previous month

Money supply rose by 1.1 per cent last fortnight mainly due to an increase in Reserve Bank credit to the Government.

Bank credit to firms and households expanded relatively slowly by about 0.3 per cent last fortnight at less than half the trend rate of growth.

Imports exceeded exports by Rs 226 crore in September, the gap shrinking by about Rs 150 crore compared to the previous month.

Foreign exchange reserves maintained the trend and increased 2 per cent last month after a marginal fall in the previous month.

Share prices first moved up and then down again over the last fortnight recording no net change, well below the trend rate of growth.

Bullion prices dipped by a third of one per cent last fortnight, a much sharper decline than the six month downward trend.

THE MARKETS

New Highs

THE SHARE markets are always telling us something though few of us know what. There has been such a big spurt in equity prices on the eve of the polling date that many marketmen believe that the die is already cast. There may be a good deal of wishful thinking in this but this is Christmas time as well as election time when hope springs eternal in the human breast—and even sharebrokers are human.

News on the industrial front is encouraging but what has turned everybody into a buyer is the general expectation that the bull phase which began six months ago after the monsoon has perhaps another six months to go before it begins to level off. What has perhaps affected the sentiment is the pronounced change in the Government's attitude towards what are known as MRTP companies. These companies have done well in the past and are now expected by many people to do even better.

A large number of shares have hit all-time peaks, which is unusual for this time of the year. Among the companies are Baroda Rayon (which has just received a letter of intent for a newsprint unit based on recycled newspapers), Bata India (which used to be a sick company not so long ago), Brooke Bond (which is diversifying rapidly into non-food product items), Chloride India (which seems to be riding high on the crest of the automotive wave), Colgate (which is always hitting new highs), Hindustan Cocoa, Indian Aluminium, Otis Elevator and Hindustan Dorr-Oliver. In the case of a number of these scrips, a bonus issue is either on the cards or cannot be ruled out. There may be more such scrips in the bonus pipeline—Philips is almost certainly one—and so perhaps is Ranbaxy which is reported to have done well this year. The Delhi-based group's stablemate, Max India, is said to be about to go on production which explains, though not wholly, the recent spurt in its price.

Engineering shares had to bear the brunt of the recession during the last couple of years but the worst seems to be over and with a large five-year plan on the drawing-board, they should turn the corner. Actually many engineering firms, like Larsen & Toubro, have now turned away from their main line of business, but they still have a big stake in the capital goods sector and should be expected to do better, though in the case of Larsen & Toubro it may be asking for the moon. Its Rs 10 share is quoted around Rs 75, an unusual thing for that kind of company. However, 1985 is expected to be an unusual year in many ways, for although the corporate sector as a whole is doing pretty well, it is passing through something of a churning pot, with so many new products and so many new companies making a bid for a place in the corporate sun.

MBA ENTRANCE

To the MBA Aspirant

Like all movements in art, literature or religion, professionalism in Management started essentially as a movement of revolt, at the end of world war II, first in the United States and then in the whole of the western world. Peter Drucker regards it as a pivotal event in history. When the change came it came in such a flood sweeping everything before it and vitally affecting every aspect of life. What was before the exclusive preserve of a coterie became the concern of everybody. It created an intense awareness of the importance of management, its functions, its role and all this will remain permanently, long after its momentum has lessened and the euphoria has died down.

In the contemporary world, it has become clear beyond a peradventure that professional management is something indispensable for planned social and economic development. With the economy of the western world shattered by the holocaust of the last war, their institutions in a shambles, it was to management that people had to turn for purposeful reconstruction. Management has been looked up to, not merely to put the wrecked economy on an even keel but to bring about revolutionary changes in cultural and social traditions, in short, to bring about a social milieu in which the concept of a Brave New World would become not just a desideratum but a reality. It has thus become a way of life — a new dynamic philosophy of life interwoven inextricably with diverse aspects of modern life.

HINDUSTAN CIBA-GEIGY

An aircraft spraying pesticides: a grave question of ethics

Dangerous Exposures

WHILE QUESTIONS are being asked as to whether Union Carbide India was using Indians as guinea-pigs at its research and development centre in Madhya Pradesh, there is at least one case on record of a multinational company doing in India what it would not dare to do in its parent country: use humans as guinea-pigs to test the safety of a pesticide. The company: Hindustan Ciba-Geigy Ltd, which makes drugs, cosmetics and three brands of pesticides, and which had a turnover in 1982 of Rs 102.2 crore.

In June and October 1975, the company tested the safety of its Nuvacron pesticide, based on organophosphorous compounds, on more than 40 Indian volunteers (including children) aged between 13 and 57. All of them stood around while an aircraft loaded with the pesticide solution sprayed them with it over a period of four days. A year later, in 1976, its associate company in Egypt sprayed six young Egyptian children with Galecron, a powerful pesticide that had immediate and disastrous effect on the children's health.

Horrifying as this use of human beings as guinea-pigs may sound, the tests were supervised by government officials, were reportedly approved by the World Health Organisation (WHO), and are claimed to have the sanction of the Insecticides Act of 1968, which requires that aerial spraying measurements be done under practical conditions to show that living beings are safe even under a shower of the stuff. But a spokesman of the public sector Hindustan Insecticides Ltd said: "Such tests are unheard of. We would never do it, and I doubt that Ciba-Geigy would have done these tests in either Europe or the United States." And with Bhopal's black December having removed any doubts that pesticides can kill, the ethics of conducting such tests become even more important.

The results of the tests in India were gratifying. R.R. Rao, M.R. Marathe and S.D. Gangoli of the Toxicology and Pathology Department of the Ciba-Geigy research centre ended their exhaustive account of the tests in an issue of Ecotoxicology and Environmental Safety by forthrightly saying: "Aerial application of Nuvacron on crops at a dose of 400-500 ml per acre did not induce any toxic effect in farm workers of either sex when they were directly exposed daily to the spray of the pesticide."

A bottle of Nuvacron: testing time

That is as it may be but few questions appear to have been raised about the ethics of such a practice. Not, of course, that Ciba-Geigy is not touchy about reports of its tests being made public. After stories of the field experiments spread, years after they were made, Dr P. Brenneisen and Dr H. Aebi of Ciba-Geigy, Basel, Switzerland, sought to clarify matters in a letter to The New Scientist last year. The letter stated: "The purpose of these measurements was to ascertain through conscientious planning and medical surveillance that inadvertent exposure during spraying does not create any hazard to a rural population." According to them the tests "establish safety without endangering the subjects, and thus should not be considered unethical".

Perhaps the Nuvacron tests did not endanger the subjects, but the Egyptian tests certainly did. Six Egyptian children aged between 10 and 18 were paid the equivalent of £10 (Rs 160) each to stand around in a cotton field while an aircraft sprayed them with Galecron, a powerful pesticide with a suspected carcinogen, Chlorodimeform, as its base. Imagine running a Naval frigate at full load and full speed. On land.

That's precisely what we do at Walchandnagar. Every time we carry out the Back-to-Back Test on our Marine Gear Boxes. For the Navy.

The Leander Class frigate is one of the Navy's most sophisticated ships. For its port and starboard main propulsion units, it requires two massive, precision gear boxes. We make them for the Navy. Naturally, before we deliver them, they have to be tested and proved 100% perfect. This is achieved by simulating the operational conditions of the gear boxes through the Back-to-Back Test. The gear boxes are coupled to steam turbines that generate 15,000 H.P. at 5750 r.p.m. which in turn is reduced to 227 r.p.m. by the gear boxes. Running at full load and full speed, the gear box performance is continuously monitored to obtain vital information. Observations show the rigidity of the housing, the efficiency of the bearings, as well as the sound level and the vibration characteristics.

The Back-to-Back Test is a very critically controlled operation. A gigantic amount of energy has to be generated and kept under tight rein.

But like scores of other massive jobs ranging from Nuclear Power Projects and Cement Plants to Space Research, we've been tackling it with complete success.

With Walchandnagar know-how and capability, no job is too big or too tough to handle.

Try us for size.

hours all six came down with organochlorine poisoning, rashes, vomiting, headaches and soaring levels of the chemical in their urine. The Egyptian Government, which had asked for the tests in the first place, banned the pesticide.

Brenneisen and Aebi came up with a letter. They said that the pesticide had been removed from the market in 1976 and reintroduced in 1978 with a "number of safety and precautionary measures in connection with the product's use". They also said that the tests were carried out "under realistic field conditions" and only when "the results of thorough prior toxicological tests have shown conclusively that no harm will come to the people who act as subjects". In Egypt, according to Brenneisen and Aebi, "young people were involved...because they are and always have been welcome and intensive helpers in the fields".

It is unlikely that "realistic field conditions" mean that a group of children stand passively while they are drenched with a poison. In fact the company was probably taking a calculated risk, because its report on Galecron in 1976 had said that "there appeared toxicological effects which we considered to be grave". The product was back in the market in 1978 but curiously about half the annual production was exported to Latin American countries—where its unsecured handling could be the most lethal—as the safety-conscious European market did not take to it.

A COMPANY spokesman in Bombay said that all tests of the kind which have drawn so much flak have been stopped. But Ciba-Geigy was in the thick of another squabble with western consumer organisations, particularly the Swedish Human Action International. The company issued a press release last fortnight which after giving the background to the dispute, concluded: "Although the exposure study did not pose any hazard to the health of the children"—not entirely true —"Ciba-Geigy regrets the involvement of children in the study. Since that time no children have been involved in any such study nor will they ever be again."

It is surprising how a company as obsessed with safety as Ciba-Geigy—the effluent treatment plant at its Rs 20-crore Goa factory has cost Rs 2 crore—could have allowed itself to carry out such obviously dangerous experiments. Even more surprising is the role of the WHO in the matter. WHO lays down the guidelines for such exposure tests and after the hullabaloo over the Egypt experiment, it gave what amounted to a clean chit to Ciba-Geigy, affirming its satisfaction at the way in which the tests were carried out and even calling them "highly ethical". Last fortnight, however, that clean chit was conspicuously absent from Ciba-Geigy's case for the defence.

While the company would clearly like to forget the whole affair, it has raised some disturbing questions: Is it right for a company to sell a product—that the well-informed West refuses to accept—to countries where the chances of its misuse are much greater? Are exposure tests really necessary and if they are, should the experimenters be allowed to interpret "realistic field conditions" in their own way? Finally, what is the secret behind WHO's earlier fulsome praise and current silence? Unfortunately the all-important answers will be a long time coming.

CRICKET

Superstar Wars

FOR WELL over a decade now, two stars have dominated the Indian cricket scene like few others before them. Sunil Gavaskar, the dimunitive dynamo, holder of the world record for the most Test centuries and one of the greatest batsmen the cricketing world has been privileged to witness. The other is, of course, Kapil Dev, the one-man demolition squad who is acknowledged universally as one of the best all-rounders in the game today.

Last fortnight, however, they were dominating the cricket scene in quite a different context, at the fulcrum of a stormy controversy that led finally, and irrevocably, to the sensational sacking of Kapil from the Indian team for the remaining bouts in the current series against England. It also threw up into full public view the serious nature of the growing friction between the two superstars of Indian cricket; friction which was finally stretched to breaking point in the second Test match in New Delhi which left the Indian team in embarrassing disgrace.

The immediate provocation for giving Kapil the chop was ostensibly the reckless and irresponsible manner in which he tossed away his wicket at a crucial stage in the match when discretion rather than abandoned aggression was the sole requirement. But the storm that erupted in its wake succeeded in revealing the broader—and baser—contours of the clash.

Though there were outraged cries of 'not quite cricket' from supporters of the Haryana all-rounder, in the purely cricketing sense, the Indian selection committee was perfectly justified in its decision to drop Kapil and the hard-hitting middle-order batsman Sandip Patil as a "disciplinary measure". The five selectors are all prominent ex-cricketers and the fact that they had little hesitation in axing Kapil and Patil after the Indian batsmen handed England the Delhi Test on a steaming platter, is adequate indication that they, like the Indian captain, felt that enough was enough. As if to confirm the correctness of their action, former English cricket captain Tony Lewis categorically stated: "They (England) would not have won without Sandip Patil and Kapil Dev throwing away their wickets."

But what really soured the pitch was the dubious role played by the Board of Control for Cricket in India (BCCI) President, N.K.P. Salve, who interrupted his hectic election campaigning on behalf of Home Minister Narasimha Rao from his residence in Nagpur to launch yet another 'Operation Salvage', a knee-jerk reconciliation move to get the two feuding stars to bury the hatchet. That the move was promptly renamed 'Operation Salve' by the media was enough indication that Salve's sole intention was to get Kapil back into the Indian side by hook or by crook. That it was more of the latter was made abundantly clear very soon.

While Kapil played his own games by announcing that he was joining the Congress (I) and would campaign for the party's candidates, Salve summoned the two protagonists to Nagpur for a closed-door meeting. Gavaskar at first declined the invitation on the grounds that he was playing in a Ranji Trophy match. Salve then dispatched BCCI trouble-shooter, K. Kanmadikar to get Gavaskar to participate in the meeting. According to board sources, Gavaskar only agreed on the condition that his passage be paid and arrangements made for him to reach Cuttack in time for the one-day international against England. Gavaskar had good reason for his reluctance. Though Salve triumphantly announced after the meet that "all the misunderstanding had been cleared", the truth was quite different. Salve's pro-Kapil slant("he is so nationalistic that he would never do anything which would go against team spirit") was made obvious in his interviews to INDIA TODAY (see box), as was his bias against Gavaskar("Sunil is near the end of his career").

That attitude was further buttressed when he prevailed upon the tour committee to recommend that 15 players instead of the usual 14 be selected to represent the Test side. Nobody was left in any doubt that the 15th player was to be Kapil. But the clumsy ploy soon backfired. Prominent former cricketers immediately issued a statement asking the selectors not to bow to pressure, a warning they valiantly heeded. At a marathon selection meeting, Salve's 'advice' was pointedly ignored and Kapil's name unceremoniously left out from the list of those selected.

According to reliable sources, Gavaskar along with two of the five selectors threatened to resign if Kapil was included. The selectors, however, were finally convinced by their own assessment of the situation which indicated that Kapil's attitude towards Gavaskar would be detrimental to the team as a whole. Their assessment is based on solid ground. All five were witness to the fact that Kapil was using every opportunity to needle Gavaskar during the Delhi Test. When spinner Sivaramakrishnan was given the ball, Gavaskar set the field for him. Kapil, standing in the slips, rearranged the field even though he was not even the vice-captain.

combines colour with good sense

A ready reckoner on how to choose and use a colour TV set.

Before making a down payment for an expensive colour TV, take a closer look at what you are paying for.

If your initial decision on the set you choose is erroneous, then there's no looking back. It could be a costly mistake. Konark TV shows you how to avoid it.

Every genuine colour TV must carry a stamp of quality conforming to DOE standards, guaranteeing safety and good performance.

Is the picture quality clear and crisp ? To check crispness, observe the letters displayed at the beginning or at the end of a programme. The letters should not be hazy.

Check if objects in the picture have natural hues and colours.

Make sure that the over scanning is within limits so that a part of the picture is not lost at the edges.

Most modern sets are designed to provide a full picture within a few seconds of switching on.

Turn on the sound and see if it is well-balanced.

Servicing, over a period of ten years may just cost you the price of the set itself. So, insist on a service contract and make sure that the manufacturer has a well-equipped service department with trained Engineers.

Now that you know how to choose the right set, here's how you use it correctly.

1. It is advisable to prefer wooden cabinets to plastic cabinets to avoid fire hazards.
2. Unplug the set when not in use for the same reason.
3. Don't put the set so close to a wall or furniture as to block ventilation.
4. Never expose the set to rain or moisture. If moisture does get into the set, ask for help to avoid fire.
5. Viewing distance should be a minimum of 8 to 10 times of the height of the screen.
6. An inferior Tuner or a defective Antenna or Cable can cause 'snow' on the screen. Ask your dealer to do the needful, if you observe this defect on your set.

A good colour TV from the people who make good colour TVs.

Here's a final bit of good advice. Choose a Konark Colour TV.

State of the art technology with components from Samsung, South Korea and Grundig of West Germany contribute to make some of the finest Konark Colour TVs in the market today.

Gavaskar had to ask him to desist.

Kapil had earlier tried to instigate a revolt against Gavaskar over a prize-money tournament in Varanasi by claiming that Gavaskar had taken more money than the rest. The fact was that Gavaskar had organised the match and was fully entitled to keep a larger share as long as the others got what he had promised them, which they had. There were other similar build-ups but the crunch came during the Delhi Test when Kapil made some disparaging remarks in the dressing-room, during the Indian second innings, against Gavaskar and the team's chances. Then, when he went out to bat, Gavaskar told him to keep his cool, advice which Kapil scornfully ignored. The altercation between the two when he returned having gifted away his wicket and sealed defeat for India was witnessed by at least two selectors and had a direct bearing on their decision to axe the all-rounder.

Regrettable as it may seem in the context of the absence of a player of his undoubted ability, the decision is widely seen as a positive step. For one, it has introduced accountability in the ranks of the senior players, a factor that was long overdue. For another, it has indicated that the cricket selectors are not prepared to buckle under political pressure of the Salve type. And, above all, it has made it clear that the kind of immaturity displayed by Kapil has no place on the cricket field. —DILIP BOBB with bureau reports

N.K.P. SALVE

Off Side

THE SETTING for 'Operation Salve' could not have been more ironically appropriate. The residence of BCCI President N.K.P. Salve was a beehive of electioneering activity on the day of his crucial meeting with Sunil Gavaskar and Kapil Dev. Against the backdrop of Congress (I) posters, khadi-clad party workers were holding heated discussions on election strategy. Salve spoke to INDIA TODAY in two separate exclusive interviews on the current controversy before and after the closed-door meeting with Gavaskar and Kapil, which is an indication of the political contours the controversy has acquired. Excerpts:

Salve: politics

Q. What are your views on the supposed altercation between Gavaskar and Kapil Dev and the subsequent controversy about Kapil being dropped from the team?

A. It is most unforeseen and unfortunate. I just cannot imagine Kapil and Sunil fighting between themselves. They have been such good friends. Both are persons who are normally well-behaved and firm nationalists.

Q. But reports clearly suggest that the two had an altercation which was witnessed by a member of the board.

A. The reports do suggest what you say but I still cannot believe it could have happened. Kapil I know is so nationalistic that he would never do anything whichcan go against team spirit. I know that whenthe Indian cricketers did not do well in a particular match, Kapil used to be terribly upset. He could not have behaved like that.

Q. Judging by the reports, it is obvious that Kapil was dropped because of the indiscreet shot he played and the way he behaved with the Indian captain after his dismissal.If this is true, could you clarify as to whether Kapil was removed from the team as a disciplinary measure?

A. I came to know about the sacking only a few hours ago and I am still to ascertain the facts from the board observers and members who were present at Delhi. All I can say is that the entire incident is most unfortunate. I have called a meeting of the tour committee to take stock of the situation and try and find a solution. The two cannot be allowed to go on warring paths.

Q. But you still have not answered the question as to whether you will intervene to see that Kapil is reinstated in the side.

A. First, I will ascertain from the selectors as to why Kapil was dropped. If he was dropped on grounds of discipline, the selection committee has erred because it has no right to take disciplinary action. But if he has been dropped for being off form then I cannot interfere in the matter. The selection committee is an autonomous body and can take its own decision on the merits of cricketers.

Q. Do you think there is any chance of the selection committee reconsidering its decision and including Kapil for the Calcutta Test?

A. That decision is for the selectors to take and I would not interfere in it.

Q. Do you agree that the dropping of an all-rounder of Kapil's stature is not good for Indian cricket if it was only for the reckless shot he played?

A. Kapil is one of the pillars of Indian cricket. He is the greatest all-rounder and we can ill-afford to lose him. He has served the cause of Indian cricket quite long and has a lot of cricket to play unlike Sunil who is nearing his end.

Q. But then don't you believe that disciplinary action should be taken against erring cricketers and if so, will you recommend any strict action against Kapil?

A. Whatever the board does will be in the interests of cricket, the country and discipline. But I still cannot believe that Kapil could behave in the way he is supposed to have.

Excerpts from the interview after Salve's meeting with the two cricketers:

Q. What was the outcome of the meeting with Gavaskar and Kapil?

A. Both have confirmed that nothing happened between them. The reports are baseless.

Q. Then why was Kapil dropped?

A. The tour committee and the chief selector have confirmed that he was dropped because he was not in form.

Q. But there was a member of the board who witnessed the altercation and now you want everybody to believe that nothing happened.

A. I have inquired into the matter. At the Delhi match, the only board member present was Mr Kanmadikar and he too has denied witnessing any altercation.

Q. It hardly sounds convincing that nothing happened and Kapil was dropped for merely being out of form. Something must have transpired.

A. The two are so cordial with each other that I cannot believe that they had an altercation.

Q. The tour committee has been asked to select 15 players instead of the normal 14. Is this a way of getting Kapil back into the side?

A. The tour committee has recommended that 15 players be selected for a Test match because it gives greater scope for selection. As for Kapil's inclusion, it is for the selectors to decide.

If you put 598 hurdles in the way of your product reaching your customers, what does that make you?

Sensible question. And, in our case, far from hypothetical.

Because we do have an all too stringent set of quality assurance procedures, almost 600 checkpoints in the case of the TL Bulkmeter, for instance, on its way to the final tryst with quality and ±0.1% accuracy it is known for.

Which explains, to an extent, its repute as the "Rolls Royce" among PDMs (positive displacement meters).

Which also explains, to an extent, the dedication that we have brought to bear on new product development so single-mindedly that, within a span of four years, we have successfully given birth to at least a dozen accessories for the TL Bulkmeter and a quarter dozen new products.

Among the latter are quick-release self-sealing TL Couplings and our latest microprocessor based, time sharing electronic control and data acquisition system for modern-day industrial and process control, the PDM Controller.

And, a compact and lightweight PDM specially suited to industrial flow measurement, developed for our associate company (Crown Measurement).

Going back to the original question, now that you know a bit about us, maybe you should draw your own conclusions.

Few drug companies have achievements that match Tamilnadu Dadha's:

Producing in-house research based bulk drugs and formulations.

When other drug manufacturers including multinationals were opting for easy ways, Tamilnadu Dadha went about the scientific way–investing heavily in high technology and creating extensive research base for itself. What followed was pharmaceutical history in the country.

Just look at Tamilnadu Dadha's unique achievements as the only manufacturers of CIS-PLATIN, a life saving anti-cancer drug, SODIUM VALPROATE, the latest anti-epileptic drug and DANAZOL, a gynaec speciality—all developed from basic stage.

Today Tamilnadu Dadha has the singular distinction of having developed CLOBETASOL, a third generation steroid, AMPICILLIN SODIUM STERILE, CHLORAMPHENICOL SODIUM SUCCINATE and many more, awaiting to be launched.

Few drug companies can match Tamilnadu Dadha in modern and sophisticated production facilities. Lyophilisation of injectibles is one such.

Having worked for continuous updating and modernisation, Tamilnadu Dadha is on the verge of yet another massive expansion programme.

A Superior Statement

MUKHAMUKHAM
DIRECTED BY: Adoor Gopalakrishnan
PRODUCED BY: K. Ravindran Nair
STARRING: P. Ganga, Karamanna and Ponnamma

GOOD cinema in 1984 bore abundantly the signs of the times—youthful, yet conventional; dazzling but not brilliant; sceptical, not probing. Luckily however, the year did not close with low budget wonders (Ardh Satya, Saraansh) and that delightful pastiche (Jaane Bhi Do Yaaro). Already showing in Kerala, and awaiting screening in the Indian Panorama section of the Film Festival in Delhi this month, Malayalee film maker Adoor Gopalakrishnan's Mukhamukham (Face to Face) does much more than spiking stale beer. It forces critics to discard the yardstick meant for competent cinema and summon the one meant for superior works. It is by far the most serious statement made on celluloid in India this year, and the sincerity of its concerns surpasses that of its contemporaries not by miles but by light-years.

Yet, like Adoor's 1982 film, Elipattayam (The Rat Trap), the 'statement' in Mukhamukham is as elusive as the contours of a dream. It defies literal summing up the way cinema, at its best, always does. But it relentlessly leads the viewer to a territory totally unexplored in Indian cinema—the inside of a revolutionary hero. It is sheer coincidence that Adoor's dialectic of the man and his image is set against the backdrop of Kerala where Marxism has both flowered and soured in a span of 25 years. The story encompasses about 15 years in the state's chequered political history when the communists had woven in and out of power, the party had split, and the idealism of the times had suffered as much erosion as the image of Adoor's revolutionary hero, Sreedharan, a dedicated worker of the Communist Party.

The first section of the film re-creates the 'image' with documentary fervour, making use of television-style interviews, voice-over narratives, wall-writings, slogans, and even short spells of editing that are unfailingly reminescent of Eisenstein's Battleship Potemkin. There is even a sequence of police brutality where a pair of spectacles fallen to the ground is intercut with the stomping of boots. Adoor captures with a strong mimetic zeal the right language to portray the hero who can touch the hearts of his followers, lead his men to a strike in a factory, and, in the process, acquire an image which is larger than life.

This section climaxes with an attack on Sreedharan, a coolly reported counter-attack on the owner of the factory in which he dies, the framing of a wounded Sreedharan in the murder charge, and his eventual escape to the underground. The script leaps across the eddies of history at this stage. Without answering where Sreedharan had been all these years, it reopens at the home of his mistress, their 10-year-old son and the woman's father. Sreedharan returns to this home a changed man.

A scene from Mukhamukham; and (inset) Gopalakrishnan: sincere concern

He is an enigma to Sudhakaran, his disciple, who has been through the rough and tumble of the split and is probably poised for a split within the split. His son too is just as hard pressed to match the image of his father with that of the confused alcoholic who has just arrived in their house. And what adds to Sreedharan's confusion is the mounting expectation of his ex-comrades from him. He is still a hero who has survived the split, but many of those who want him back in their folds have gone in for the soft option.

Sreedharan's only gesture of defiance is to lapse into a Rip Van Winkle-slumber. Soon afterwards, he is clubbed to death by one of the rival groups. The 'image' is then ceremonially recalled, and the funeral procession somberly snakes along the village roads to the strains of the Internationale.

Actor P. Ganga's rough-hewn face, and the inscrutable gestures that flit across it, slowly build up the hero-like presence of Sreedharan. But Adoor keeps on pricking the balloon even as he blows it, and it is the woman, Savitri, who comes to know his secrets—the stomach-ache which is an excuse for drinking, the repressed lust which often camouflages itself as coyness, the weariness, the self-doubt.

The image-building and deflation come with a detachment that seems clinical. The screen is splashed with titles that often quote Lenin to say that the tree lives on while the leaves fall off, thus singing a requiem for Sreedharan in the manner of the chorus in Greek tragedy. And it is not altogether a negative view of communism that Adoor presents because the flame of idealism somehow manages to survive in Sudhakaran.

Adoor resents the film being called political. "I don't know why the papers are constantly calling it so," he says. But the fact remains that no Indian film has ever attempted to portray life within a communist party with so much of authenticity. And this life is worth a portrayal not only because the communist party movement is an integral part of Indian politics but because it shows humanity in a unique state of existence.

Mukhamukham's significance lies not only in its being a pathbreaker but in the subtle evocation of the now-forgotten language of agitprop cinema, in its uninhibited transition from the documentary style to the dramatic, and, finally, in the detached dignity with which the film chronicles personal as well as political history. Despite Adoor's unexplained objections, it is a superb political film though it aims at interpreting the world without offering or trying to change it.

She works 9 to 5, teaches her children, keeps an immaculate home and does all the cooking...
...on Superflame, of course.

Yes, Meera's busy. But she's organised. And efficient. Whether it's putting the kids to sleep or handling a tricky client in the office, changing the curtains at home or cooking dinner for her family, she's quite at home.

And she's always cooked on Superflame. Because, as she says crisply, it's the only brand that's been tried & trusted. And since it doesn't believe in gimmicks, it's the most economical too. And the safest. Besides, she adds with a twinkle in her eye, "My mother uses it."

INDIA: THE SIEGE WITHIN
BY M.J. AKBAR
Penguin Books
Price: £2.95

THE NUMBER of Indians who have been published by Penguins can be counted on one's finger-tips. To have one's first work bear the imprint of this prestigious firm of publishers which specialise in low-priced books designed for mass circulation should indeed be a matter of enormous gratification for one as young as Akbar. His qualifications for pronouncing on contemporary Indian history are impeccable. After training with The Illustrated Weekly of India and a short but not very distinguished stint as editor of Onlooker he found his niche in the Anand Bazar group of papers editing a weekly, Sunday, and a daily, The Telegraph—all before he was 30.

The book is divided in three parts. The first deals with the birth of Pakistan and its dismemberment; the second with Akali politics, the Anandpur Resolution, Bhindranwale, 'Operation Blue Star', the assassination of Mrs Gandhi and the anti-Sikh riots that followed; the third with Kashmir, its emergence as a semi-autonomous Indian state under the leadership of Sheikh Abdullah, the Sheikh's disputes with the Central Government, the succession of Dr Farooq Abdullah and his downfall. In a country where one crisis follows another and whose yesterdays pass into the limbo of history of yesteryears, it is difficult to write anything which does not get outdated in a very short time. Akbar has brought his narrative right down to the events of November 1984.

Most keen followers of Indian affairs will be familiar with much that Akbar has to say about the background and political developments in the subcontinent. For them his narration will provide a refresher course in the history of recent times enlivened by pithy anecdotes, apt quotations and reminiscences of people he met. He also has an uncanny way of summing up history in a few sentences. To wit: "Pakistan was carved in the thirties, launched in the forties, distorted in the fifties, choked in the sixties and decimated in the seventies. With yet another gun-and-moustache man (General Zia-ul-Haq) at the helm in the eighties, the future looks as tenuous as the past." His summary of Sikhism is equally perceptive: "In 1499 Guru Nanak had proclaimed his mission: in 1699 Guru Govind gave the Sikh the Khalsa identity; in 1799 the first independent Sikh kingdom was set up; and within precisely fifty years, by 1848, the one-generation empire had dissipated in waste of spirit. The Sikhs had survived their terrible battle against Muslim arms. Could they survive the war with the Hindu mind?"

Akbar's answer to the question is in the negative based entirely on the fact there are not enough of them. The Sikh struggle to keep their identity distinct ultimately forced their leaders to resort to hostility against Hindus and patronage of men like Bhindranwale. Akbar met Bhindranwale ("a gun in his hand a sermon on his lips"); it did not take him very long to realise that his "intellectual qualities were a trifle limited; when he was not sounding foolish, he sounded ludicrous." He puts the blame for patronising Bhindranwale's entry into Sikh politics squarely on Giani Zail Singh and Mrs Gandhi's Congress party. He asserts correctly that the Sikh masses "did not respond to Bhindranwale's efforts to create anti-Hindu riots—a large majority of Sikhs were simply not interested in breaking India's unity."

Akbar does not mince his words pronouncing on the succession of confrontations between Abdullah and Nehru who were "the best of personal friends and the worst of political enemies." If Kashmir is a part of India, it is more due to Sheikh Abdullah than to Pandit Nehru. And if Kashmir is in a mess today it is more the making of Mrs Gandhi than that of Farooq Abdullah. The sordid way he was removed from office is lucidly spelt out. Once it was decided to oust Farooq from power, B.K. Nehru who refused to be party to questionable tactics was transferred to Gujarat to be replaced as governor by Jagmohan, a man "with a very lax attitude towards truth".

Any book of such dimensions attempting to compress the political history of a continent of teeming millions in 300-odd pages is bound to be controversial. But no one will question Akbar's erudition, objectivity and commitment to his craft. His racy style of writing makes reading a sheer pleasure.

RUDOLF NUREYEV

A Legend Comes to Town

HENRY BOURCHEIX

ONE FROSTY day in March 1938, a little chestnut-haired boy was born in a train rattling along towards Vladivostok on the east coast of the USSR. No cornets or drums heralded the event. But just 23 years later, the entire world of western dance would acknowledge that in Rudolf Hametovich Nureyev, a star had indeed been born. And nothing would characterise his forceful and brilliant foray into ballet better than the impetuosity with which he entered the world. Today Nureyev, 46, is still the stuff of which legends are made: the rage of balletomanes, sex symbol to hysterical groupies and above all, classical dancer non pareil. "He is not just one more dancer of first-class talent," says critic Alexander Bland. "He is one of those strange, haunted artists that ballet throws up from time to time, dancers through whom some intense, urgent message seems to be passing."

This fortnight the legendary Nureyev will dance before Indian audiences for the first time. He says he is looking forward to visiting a country with such a rich dance tradition of its own. In his performances in Delhi and Bombay he will be accompanied by dancers from the Paris Opera Ballet, of which he is the artistic director. The company, which is considered to be among the three best along with the USSR's Kirov and Bolshoi ballets, will be the second to appear this season—the Bolshoi was here just last month. For Nureyev, who says "what is my country? My country is dance", India will be another of the worlds he loves to conquer.

At an age when most male dancers have retired into obscurity, Nureyev is out there in the glare of spotlights; dancing, choreographing, even acting in films. But even he is mortal, it seems. The effects of age on his still tautly-muscled, feline body are becoming visible on stage despite his heroic efforts to compensate for them. Critics have been predictably quick to notice that the sensuous young faun is now middle aged. Commonweal magazine commented on a 1981 performance: "The quality of his performance is clearly less on a purely technical basis that it once was. His dancing now possesses an obvious athletic quality that used to be hidden in his characterisation..." Critic Tobi Tobias was more caustic: "His groupies refuse to believe it, but Nureyev really can't dance any more."

It's not just his groupies who remain unconvinced by the critics' sharp attacks. Nureyev's immaculately artistic and technically perfect performances have won him the enduring admiration of connoisseurs like Jackie Kennedy Onassis. "The critics?" she laughs. "It's like the bull ring—they push you to extend yourself, and when you do, they knock you for going on so long." How long will he continue to dance? "As long as it pleases me," he says firmly. And when he does take his last bow as a dancer, his recent appointment as the artistic director of the prestigious Paris Opera Ballet will ensure him an equally productive post-performance career involved with dance.

But for the moment, Nureyev continues to be a man "eaten up by dance". It is his utter dedication to his calling—so strong it could be called an obsession—that has won for him his coveted place as one of the greatest male dancers of all time along with Nijinsky. For Nureyev, the superstar, the media god, is also a dancer of high intelligence and a formidable knowledge of dance and dance history. He himself has never taken anything for granted. "Every step must be sprayed with your blood," Nureyev has said, sincerely, if somewhat theatrically. Dame Margot Fonteyn, the principal guest artiste of England's Royal Ballet with whom the young Nureyev shared a long and magical partnership made the surprising discovery very early on: "The young boy everyone thought so wild and spontaneous in his dancing cared desperately about his technique."

That is why, some 20 years later, critics are still forced to acknowledge his greatness. Barbara Newman says: "As resolute as ever about perfecting his technique, he has become less reckless executing it." She marvels: "Although he neither has the technique, nor the strength or stamina he once had, he still corrects his body instant by instant...it's like watching Isaac Stern tune and string his Stradivarius while playing cadenzas on it." Small wonder, then, that his career has been so prodigious. He has appeared with over 30 of the world's major dance companies, mounted, and partly choreographed as many as 25 productions including The Sleeping Beauty, Swan Lake, Raymonda, Don Quixote, The Nutcracker and Act IV of La Bayadere. As a young dancer in Russia, Nureyev had already appeared in all the classical ballets with the famous Kirov and Bolshoi companies.

After his defection to the West—on a tour of France with the Kirov Ballet, he jumped over the railing of Le Bourget Airport in Paris to elude Russian security-men accompanying the dancers—Nureyev broadened his artistic vision, including modern dance as well in his repertoire. He particularly admired the work of the American choreographer Martha Graham whose work he danced with Margot Fonteyn in Lucifer, 10 years ago. His continuous search for choreographers who would add one more dimension to his already formidable arsenal of dance took him to the work of Maurice Bejart (Songs of a Wayfarer), Glen Tetley (Tristan), Murray Louis (Moments), George Balanchine (Apollon Musagete), Paul Taylor (Aureole), and more recently, Martha Graham (Phaedra's Dream).

The dancer, whom US critic John Martin disdainfully called a "gigolo", ironically enough acted as a powerful corrective to the prevalent trend of downplaying the male dancer's role in the ballet. Where once the male dancer was merely a counterpoint to the ballerina, Nureyev put the glamorous male star back on centre-stage. He says, a trifle chauvinistically: "I consider men to have a better organised brain and better able to separate themselves from nature and their own nature ... men are better at everything. They have the higher level of sensibility and sensitivity. And so it has to be." He however adds: "But in my ballets, I leave everything that is of value for a woman and I add material for the man just to restore the equilibrium."

When he dances, the effect is positively masculine. Says Alexander Blanc: "The effect he makes can be double edged, with sexual magnetism which is discernible to both men and women. Th

INTERVIEW

"I shall always be dancing"

AT FORTY-SIX, most male ballet dancers have their careers irrevocably behind them. Not the legendary Rudolf Nureyev, the acknowledged "phenomenon of dance" who just last year took over as the artistic director of the prestigious Paris Opera Ballet. The Russian-born star, whose visit to India will be his first exposure to the country, was interviewed by dance critic SUNIL KOTHARI on behalf of INDIA TODAY in Paris last month. Excerpts from the interview:

Q. It is almost 25 years since your dramatic defection to the West in Paris. And now in the same city you are the director of the Paris Opera Ballet. How do you look at your growth during the period?

A. Whatever has happened is on account of my hard and persistent work. I did go through a strenuous period of apprenticeship and made it to the top. And when I decided to go to the West, I did not stop growing. The artistic growth has been natural. Therefore when I find myself as the artistic director of the Paris Opera Ballet, I find it quite logical.

Q. How do you propose to give a company as big and long established as this one a new sense of purpose?

A. I would like to show it off in the best possible manner by highlighting its strong points, propelling its best dancers, projecting them in a manner which brings out the best in them. For instance, I choreographed the new and yet not unfamiliar Raymonda for their repertory which was not with them. At the same time, I sent off a contingent of more than 150 dancers to perform their own classic Coppelia at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees. I had young dancers making their debuts in the leading roles, for example Yannick Stephant with Olivier Patey. I succeeded in having the most celebrated ballerina of France, Yvette Chauvire, dance for the company after her retirement.

Q. But has there been some resistance to this? How did the established stars respond?

A. Of course, there has been some resistance. Any artistic director would face that in the beginning. It is, to give an example, like eating strange and exotic food. For instance, when I was in Japan, I visited a Japanese restaurant and there they ate raw fish. In the beginning it was difficult to eat, but I developed a taste for it. Similarly, the dancers did find it difficult to adjust to the demands I made on them. But the initial teething trouble was over when they saw that the purpose was to give the company the best projection.

Q. In Russia, both at the Bolshoi and the Kirov schools, there is a great concern for preserving ballet tradition. In your experience in the West, do you get the impression the traditions have been weakened there?

A. I respect tradition and my concerns have been to keep the spirit. But I do not think the traditions are weakened. They took deeper root in, say, England, in France. What interests me is how to reconstruct the steps, not exactly like Petipa did, but to present them as he would have in the present time. I am talking of the 19th century works of classic, romantic ballets.

Q. Would you like to teach as your guru Pushkin taught?

A. I would like the student to expand his repertoire. The care and concern will be like my guru but I would like the young dancers to flower into dancers on their own individual strong points.

Q. How do you see your role, say after 10 years?

A. I shall always be dancing, even after 10 years. Of course I would be choreographing, and I do not see myself as completely retiring from the stage. There is so much to do.

Q. Like films—after your experience in Valentino and Exposed?

A. Let us see. I like to forget about Exposed. I would like to choreograph modern things, but prefer to dance classical.

Q. Who do you think are the talented young male dancers who can hold out on their own?

A. Many. Patrick Dupond, Charles Jude, Jean Guizerix, Bujones Ferdinand, Anthony Dowell. A brilliant young Russian dancer, Farouk Rouzimatov. Mikhail Baryshnikov—but he should concentrate more on dancing than acting. But really, I should not be saying so because I too like to act.

Q. Will your Indian programme be a pot-pourri or is there a chance of seeing a complete ballet?

A. I'm afraid it will be a mixed bag as you do not have big enough stages to mount the full ballet, and it is so expensive to bring the full complement of ballet with a live orchestra and the full company. Maybe in the future when there is sufficient time and all the facilities exist in India, we will bring a full ballet.

Q. What do you look forward to seeing in India?

A. You have a great dance tradition. I would, of course, love to see dances. And also like to find old costumes, real antiques. I love to collect them.

uality is backed by a presence of almost ypnotic force...some inner dynamo eems to make him glow with invisible in- andescence." Whether Nureyev himself ecognised this or not, his fans certainly d—teenage girls would crowd around e stage door after a performance, anting: "We want Rudi in the nudi."

Nureyev has partnered practically very ballerina of note in the world. Vhile in the Kirov, he danced with the amous Natalia Dudinskaya, and then Natalia Makarova. But his partnership ith Margot Fonteyn was the most amous—after a spectacular erformance with her in Vienna, he took 89 curtain alls, making it to the Guinness Book of World Records.

Apart from dance, he has cted in films like Valentino based on the life of the 1920s Hollywood idol Rudolf Valentino) and Exposed, which e jocularly says he'd like to orget all about. His ballet novies include Romeo and Juliet, and Evening with the Royal Ballet. He has also cted in films for the small creen— Roland Petit's Le eune Homme et la Mort, Petrushka , Paul Taylor's Big Bertha segment on the Burt Bacharach special on CBS, Birgit Gulberg's Adam and Eve and Julie Andrew's Invitation to the Dance, also for BS. He has a yearly Nureyev and Friends rogramme, and has also appeared in the ndearing Muppet Show and with compariot and fellow dancer Mikhail Baryshnikov in Paul Taylor's From Sea to Shining Sea.

The dancer's immense contribution o his art has been acknowledged officially several times over: in 1980, the Philadelphia College of the Performing Arts awarded him an honorary doctorate. The Mayor of Paris has presented Nureyev with the city's prestigious Grande Medaille de Vermeil, and he received the Dance Magazine Award in 1980 from the amous dancer Eric Bruhn.

Ironically, Nureyev began late—too ate to mould his body to the rigorous demands of classical dance, as a result of which he developed a calcium spur on his ight heel which cuts into his flesh, making dancing very painful. But Nureyev, born of Tartar parents in Russia, is a stoic soldier of dance, and his late beginning only made him more determined to succeed.

When Nureyev was finally accepted into the Kirov Ballet School at 17, a disgruntled teacher predicted sourly: "You will either be a failure or a star. Probably the former." But the young Tartar completed his training in just three years, receiving training as a soloist from his revered teacher Alexander Pushkin. Soon he was partnering Kirov's prima ballerina Natalia Dudinskaya in the ballet Laurentia. But the stubbornly individualistic Nureyev was not popular with either his fellow dancers or the authorities. He never participated in group activities, showing "an abnormal taste for solitude", refused to join the Komsomol, the Communist Youth League and criticised the artistic policies of the company as being too static. Yet his unquestionable ability made him important to the Kirov. When in 1961, the company planned its tour of France and England, the authorities decided to leave Kirov's principal male dancer Konstantin Sergeyev behind, as he might be too old to appeal to western audiences. Enter Rudolf Nureyev. Paris loved the small, slender, well-proportioned young dancer. His slanting smokey blue-grey eyes, his high cheekbones, those "artistic" nostrils and sensual lips made the dancer an instant star.

HENRY BOURCHEIX

In a Paris Opera ballet production

On June 17, 1961, the dancers of the Kirov Ballet assembled at Le Bourget Airport in Paris, waiting to board a flight to UK. Nureyev was not given a ticket for the flight. Instead, the astounded young dancer—he was just 23 then—heard he was to be sent back to Russia for his "insubordination, non-assimilation and dangerous individualism". He jumped over the railings into the arms of the French flics, seeking sanctuary.

He left his own Kirov company in Paris and joined the Ballets Marquis de Cuevas for one year and toured Europe causing a sensation wherever he performed. It was during the lessons that he was taking from Vera Volkova, the only teacher who taught at the Copenhagen ballet along the same lines as in Russia, that he received an invitation from Dame Margot Fonteyn to appear in a gala in London. And from then on there was no looking back. The legendary partnership between him and Margot Fonteyn started from 1962 and a regular association with Britain's Royal Ballet that gave his repertoire an extraordinary range. The special quality of the partnership spurred Margot Fonteyn to surpass her past achievements in a new blossoming of her gifts as were exemplified in the ballet Giselle. Whereas the first ballet was created to use Nureyev's talents, Marquerite and Armand mirrored in Frederick Ashton's choreography the romantic quality and passionate drama of the greatest dance partnership of their time.

After a long association with the Royal Ballet as its permanent guest artiste Nureyev left to seek newer pastures. Everywhere he went, he was followed by stories. Ballet purists abhor his wild life-style and popstar image. But his friends sense his seriousness of purpose and his sense of loneliness. Fonteyn recalls: "He always walked off into the night, a lonely figure diminishing down a desolate street. There was something tragic in his departing step after the uproar of laughter and gaiety over dinner." He also has a sense of humour—he calls the calcium spur that troubles his right foot an "omelette", and makes a complicated bandage for it which he calls a "sandwich". He describes his parents as being "volatile, passionate and sensuous, with a curious mixture of tenderness and brutality", a description that could fit him easily.

Nureyev is half-serious when he says: "I think I'll just go on forover. I've always felt like the Chosen One." John Lombaride commented in the New York Times Magazine: "He embodies a dream that, somehow, the generation that came of age in the '60s wants to believe in: youth is a matter of will, you don't have to grow old." Even if Nureyev the dancer fades into Nureyev the choreographer, Nureyev the legend will never grow old.

◆ Heroes don't just fade away. They can always pose for after-shaves or stand in for suiting-shirting ads. Of course, if they are Amitabh Bachchan or Sunil Gavaskar they can also become comic book legends. Nircon, a branch of Nirlon, the firm where India's ace cricketer is employed, has also decided to put their hero up for sale. Sunny the Super Sleuth comic books will zoom into the market some time in January with a series of on and off the field adventures in full colour that should—for four rupees—send children wild over the batsman. Said publisher C. Vasudeo: "Naturally the comics will have a lot of cricket action too."

◆ It's show time: Scheduled to be on the air mid-January are our very own disco diwanas Nazia and Zoheb Hassan who came some years ago, sung a highly provacative Aao na pyar karen and then disappeared into thin air—presumably to finish their studies. Now, older and wiser, the brother and sister are back and have charmed CBS into releasing their fresh new album Young Tarang—estimated to do at least a double platinum. And CBS, on its part, is planning a release that is going to change everything in Indian showbiz. While the album is put on the market, a very special video series—Michael Jackson's Thriller style and shot partly here and partly in England—is going to start on Doordarshan showing Nazia and Zoheb dramatising their songs. "It's a new musical wave that will hit listeners," CBS chief Ravi Burman declared in an interview. That's all Indian television needs now—a dash of disco.

Nazia and Zoheb: comeback

◆ It could have been—it should have been—the biggest film bash of the year. It's not everyday that the children of two film titans marry each other. But as Kumar Gaurav walked his coy bride Namrata seven times round the sacred flame, it was obvious that papas Sunil Dutt and Rajendra Kumar had other things on their mind. With the massive election campaign that had Dutt pitted against formidable BJP rival Ram Jethmalani just round the corner, the wedding turned out to be a somewhat modest affair. Neither of Gaurav's old flames, Rima Kapoor or Vijayeta Pandit turned up. Still, there was merrymaking a-plenty and two nice surprises: a group of spastics who came to congratulate their favourite uncle Sunil—and Jethmalani's son Mahesh who graciously admitted: "Decency demanded I make an appearance."

Kumar Gaurav & Namrata: filmi alliance

◆ As the election results ticked in and the winds began blowing—nay, raging—in favour of the ruling party, the enterprising Rajya Sabha MP Vishwa Bandhu Gupta invited Rajiv Gandhi to a semi-deserted airstrip for a little surprise. The little surprise, it turned out, was a balloon shaped like the Congress(I) hand, which when inflated rose to a prodigious height of 80-odd feet, dwarfing the excited prime minister and the entire royal clan present. "What is it made of?" inquired the former pilot, quite heady with the compliment. Well, 1,200 metres of pure white taffeta silk, six months of hard work and if those lines on the palm tell right, a nice cushy future ahead.

The Congress(I) hot air balloon: flying high

◆ After a long and trying courtship, it seems that Kamla the slave girl is finally going to be able to tell her story on screen. After many months of battling a copyright and defamation suit launched by the Indian Express, Jagmohan Mundhra the harassed producer-director of the controversial film Kamla finally got the go-ahead from the hig court to go ahead and relea his film based on the pl based on the Express's rep on the existence of flesh tra ing in modern India. "It is major victory and a big relie said Mundhra who has be asked to make only two vo minor changes in the film.

CONGRESS(I) SWEEP

The landslide victory of the Congress(I) ("A Historic Mandate", January 15) in almost all the states and Union territories has once again established the fact that it is only the national party which can save the country at this present juncture. The Opposition should learn a lesson from the election results: that criticism of the ruling party does not always pay dividends.

Patna MAJOR BALBIR SINGH

■ The overwhelming victory of the Congress(I) is simply because Rajiv Gandhi appears to be a clean young man who has been thrust upon the national scene with a promise to usher in an honest government, fight corruption and take the nation forward. Rajiv has a few plus points to his advantage—he is young, has no hang-ups about being a 'freedom fighter' which we are all fed up of hearing, has no axe to grind and above all he is progressive and modern. Being an ex-pilot one expects that he would be trained to take logical decisions and not buckle under in a crisis.

Vrindaban DR K.R. BHATT

■ Your timely warning to the ruling party about the dangers of arrogance (Comment, January 15) was much appreciated. It is a well-known fact that power can easily breed arrogance, and more so when the mandate is so massive.

The present majority of the Congress(I) in the Lok Sabha will not prove to be for the betterment of democracy. Democracy demands a solid opposition to run wheels smoothly. But where is the Opposition today in the Parliament? The prime minister will have to assert himself and shun the sycophants and flatterers around him, take the opinion of experts in the field where he lacks knowledge and experience, fight corruption and widespread favouritism, or he will not be in a position to satisfy the electorate.

Indore PRABHAKAR S. HARSOLE

■ With the massive mandate given to Rajiv Gandhi, the people expect him to set a new tone and style in managing the affairs of the vast country. It was not for the want of talent or lack of resources that our progress has been so tardy. It is for the want of vision and lack of commitment to the nation's good beyond personal or party consideration.

New Delhi V.C. VISWANATHAN

■ The 'sympathy wave' in favour of the Congress(I) is dangerous and its implications would be felt only after some time. As massive a mandate as this for any democracy could prove harmful to the country's interests. Democracy in India is as it is on the verge of vanishing. Our real trouble lies not in the democratic institutions themselves but in the people who man them.

The new prime minister will have to be extra cautious about every move that he makes considering he has inherited a party not known for selfless service, ability and adherence to norms and rules in the recent years.

Gandhinagar, Orissa ABHIR PADHY

■ The unprecedented victory of the Congress(I) in the Lok Sabha elections will surely go down in history as one of the greatest events of Indian democracy. The people have given the Congress(I) under Rajiv Gandhi an overwhelming vote of confidence, which is a vote for both Indira Gandhi and Rajiv. The effectiveness with which Rajiv ruled the country during the turbulent period immediately after Mrs Gandhi's assassination must have impressed on the voter the extraordinary leadership qualities of the young Gandhi. It has also successfully gathered the votes of Hindus which is explained by the rout of the BJP, the traditional vote-catcher of the conservative Hindus.

The people are fully aware of every step the Government takes—the Emergency of 1975-77 led to the stunning defeat of the Congress(I), the expulsion of Mrs Gandhi from Parliament during the Janata regime lead to the landslide victory of the Congress(I) in 1980—so Rajiv should be careful. The four-fifth majority of the Congress(I) indicates that the people have voted for a change and have trusted Rajiv to bring it about. He should be aware of it and the fact that people have high expectations from the party.

■ Kudos to the Indian electorate. Who said that the majority of the electorate is illiterate and hence lacks rational judgement. They have given the most fitting reply that they possibly could to the Opposition by voting for the Congress(I) practically en masse.

Mercara, Coorg — K.T.M. MOHANAN

■ In the cover story you have said that "there was an unbalanced geographical character in the Cabinet". But I think it is a very welcome change to have ministers chosen on the basis of their merit instead of their racial or geographical background.

Ludhiana — PUNEET MOHINDRA

■ A fantastic issue, but a bad cover. Could you not get anything different? This particular picture was flashed over the Doordarshan a number of times and is the kind of picture every other magazine would carry.

Jaipur — OMPRAKASH PUSHKARNA

■ The nation has made the right choice in electing Rajiv Gandhi to head the Government, and it was truly a "historic mandate". But for the Congress(I) to employ such low-stooping tactics as to put up posters depicting our late prime minister in her death throes, (Elections '84, January 15) is to my mind, unspeakable. And if I were Rajiv Gandhi, I would certainly never allow likenesses of my mother in agony, her lifeblood pouring out of her, to be pasted on walls all over the country: it is merely capitalising on the "sympathy factor" to its extremes. It is one thing for Hollywood to use this "gross-out" technique to advertise movies like Friday The 13th, and another altogether for the Congress(I) to do the same thing.

Madras — DHIRAJ MANI

■ The resounding victories of the parties led by Rajiv Gandhi and N.T. Rama Rao point out that the electorate intensely dislikes squabbling professional politicians. Given a chance they would prefer the non-career politicians who are able to convince the electorate that they will form a unified government if elected to power.

In the interest of a healthy democracy it may be prudent to form a new party of prominent professionals in various fields and allocate portfolios beforehand to be able to convince the people that they would not face yet another disunited government.

Houston, Texas — R.M. RAO

BHOPAL TRAGEDY

Your cover story, the "City of Death" (December 31) was a very comprehensive account of the Bhopal tragedy. The photographs were excellent, especially the one showing a hand trying to close the unseeing eyes of a child being buried. The accident is most regrettable since multinationals are reputed to be well managed. And what happens to the state Government which bears the responsibility for allowing the setting up of this dangerous plant? Inquiry commissions will be set up, the tragedy will be intensively researched, every fact will be gone through. It will take years and then the findings consigned to history.

Bombay — S.E. MEERZA

■ I disagree with the move made by the Madhya Pradesh Chief Minister Arjun Singh to arrest the Union Carbide Chairman Warren Anderson. One must appreciate the fact that he came down in person as soon as he got the news, when he could easily have sent a team of experts for a survey if he so desired and kept out of the hassle himself.

Pune — ANIL PANJABI

MISSING PROGRAMME

In the various election manifestos of the leading political parties (December 31) the family planning programme seems to have been omitted. Today, more than anything else, we need a concrete and result-oriented population controlling programme on a war footing. However, it seems as though no party was willing to take a risk and burn its fingers —by raising this otherwise hot issue, considering it cost Mrs Gandhi the 1977 election.

Vapi — K.K. SOLANKI

ACCURATE FORECAST

Your pre-election issue (December 31) was superb. Now that the results are out, one can really appreciate the accuracy of your forecasts. The statistics are very well presented and the articles are not only informative, but eminently readable as well.

Bombay — URMILA DONGRE

■ The election forecast was good advertisement copy for the Congress(I). I have no doubt that your forecast has swayed the urban middle class vote in favour of the Congress(I).

Pune — G.P. JOSHI

Beyond Bhopal

MORE than six weeks after the Bhopal disaster, the issue of how and how much the thousands of victims of the gas leakage are to be compensated still remains to be sorted out, as does the downstream question of what lessons must be learnt from the tragedy. The headline-hitting law suits in the United States, claiming damages from Union Carbide that total a staggering $180 billion do not automatically settle the compensation question. The large sums that have been claimed might prove a complete mirage since there is as yet no certainty that US courts will hear the cases. In any case, the law suits will take years to run their course (American courts do not always dispense justice as speedily as is popularly imagined), and much of the money will be pocketed by American lawyers who took powers of attorney from innocent Bhopal victims and flew back without leaving even their addresses behind. While Union Carbide should be made to pay, it is far from certain that the best way to do this is to leave the matter to American lawyers. The responsibility for taking a proper initiative lies with the Central and state governments.

These have moved unconscionably slowly so far. The attorney general decided to visit the US more than five weeks after the Bhopal incident, in order to assess the legal situation. And after some initial speculation in the newspapers about the Madhya Pradesh Government sueing Union Carbide, nothing has been heard on the subject. The Government simply must move with a greater sense of urgency if the Bhopal victims are to get compensation, and get it quickly. The sums handed out as relief payments have been niggardly, some of the victims have received no payments at all, and many of the victims now show an understandable anger at the dilly-dallying. A proper assessment has to be made quickly about the likelihood of getting quick justice and proper compensation in American courts, the option of setting up a special court in India considered, and the advantages of going in for a negotiated settlement carefully weighed. Union Carbide itself has been pressing for arbitration, and for avoiding the courts, but whether this is self-serving advice or a suggestion made with the victims in mind needs to be considered. Even a negotiated settlement must include punitive damages that Union Carbide must pay up so that it serves as a lesson to all other companies in the country.

Looking beyond Bhopal, much of the debate on the implications of the worst industrial accident in history has focused on multinational corporations and on whether they employ different standards of safety in their home countries and in the Third World. While this is a legitimate and important concern, it is also in a sense side-tracking the main issue about safety consciousness in India. In the weeks after Bhopal, there have been a number of other incidents of gas leakages and explosions, plus a major Cochin refinery explosion earlier in 1984. These concerned Indian companies, some owned by the Government. And there is mounting evidence to show that there are deficiencies in the law (the absence of a specific law on the manufacture, storage and transport of hazardous substances, for instance), and still greater deficiencies in the implementation of existing laws. Factory inspectors are too few in number, badly paid, easily bribed, and too often incapable of properly assessing safety.

The Government itself is often clueless about the dangers brought in by substances licensed for manufacture. Insurance company assessments show a depressing lack of proper safety facilities in everyday factories across the country, and the public is inured to the everyday reality of workers losing their limbs in industrial situations, of domestic gas cylinders leaking as a matter of course, of pesticide accretions in food substances going well beyond the specified safety limits, and much more. The two conclusions that flow from these are all too obvious: Indian life is cheap, and the country has yet to properly acquire an industrial culture, the software that goes with the hardware of machinery. Finally, some of the righteous indignation over multinational corporations shifting pollution-causing factories from their home territories to Third World locations must be re-directed at the Third World Governments that permit such relocation.

There is some evidence now (outlined elsewhere in this issue) of the Government waking up, taking stock of the gaps in the law and its implementation, and drawing up new guidelines for handling dangerous industries. This is welcome, but the Government must make sure that the new laws required are quickly legislated, and the existing laws implemented more faithfully than has been the case in the past. Safety and inspection staff need to be strengthened, industrial location policy given another look, and fresh laws passed to make company directors personally responsible for damage caused by industrial accidents that could have been prevented by foresight and greater safety consciousness. If all this is done quickly, the thousands who have lost their lives or been otherwise affected in Bhopal will not have suffered in vain. If not, Bhopal will stand as a permanent question mark over the value of human life in India.

DOUBLE TROUBLE

■ The Bombay-Pune road is one of the busiest arteries in India. There are obstacles to the smooth flow, of course, notably the octroi posts and the police road-blocks presided over by fat-bellied policemen who lose no opportunity to milk the drivers. Last fortnight, at one such post a beat-up old truck rumbled to a halt, its nose pointing towards Pune. Its registration number, for the sake of argument was MMT 3456. The driver then clambered down and sauntered off to get his papers checked.

A few minutes later, another truck, brand new this time, and manifestly owned by the same transport company, rolled up on the other side of the barrier, its nose pointing towards Bombay. Its driver, too, clambered down and sauntered off to the checkposts—did a double take and stopped. He had seen the other driver, who for some reason started sweating profusely.

The policeman on duty groaned to his feet, intrigued by this little drama. He looked at the trucks and did the third double take of the day. The new truck's registration plate proudly proclaimed MMT 3456. The company had been running two trucks on duplicate sets of papers and had been doing so for months. This time, around, obviously logistics had fouled up somewhat.

PEOPLE'S POWER

■ Traffic problems are the price of success in any big city. Calcutta, which appears to follow Murphy's Law with great diligence in everything, is no exception to the lack of rules. As politicians never tire of saying, it is the people who should come together to breathe order into chaos and that is precisely what happened in Calcutta recently.

At a crossing in the city, a couple of thousand cars were locked in combat and the result was that no driver could find an inch of tar to take even if anybody was willing to give him one. The police, it would seem, had decided to take the day off. Finally, an exasperated driver got out of his car, went to the podium and started directing the traffic. Pretty soon he was joined by a Sikh truck-driver, who was considerably more effective, a vegetable seller, a lady driver and two company chauffers. Between them, they managed to get the tangled snarls moving until a more or less even flow was established in either direction. No wonder that the power of the people is evoked by all and sundry whenever they are faced with a problem. It does seem to work.

IDENTITY CRISIS

■ The general elections are a good source of funny stories. One of these concerns a man called Pankaj Sinha, who was the Congress(I) MLA from the Islampur assembly constituency in the Nalanda Lok Sabha constituency from Bihar. Sinha hasn't been to Islampur since the people sent him to the Assembly.

Last month, Sinha was the party candidate for the Lok Sabha seat. In due course of time he arrived in Islampur to ask for votes. He took up the usual pose of a humble leader, dhoti, kurta, namaste and a beatific smile on his lips. The usual speech followed about valuable votes and I have come to serve you and so on and so forth.

All this was happening in bright sunlight. Even so Sinha must have been more than a little surprised to see that quite a few of his audience were carrying torches. At some invisible signal they switched them on and shone them full into his face. The questions they asked were "who is this man, have we seen him before?". Sinha would probably have fled from the scene had not a minister, a wide grin on his face, persuaded the villagers to switch off their torches.

PARKING PERILS

■ Space is at such premium in Bombay, every square inch FSI or no FSI is fought over chipped tooth and broken nail. So it was with considerable anger that a resident of an apartment block in Dadar watched his neighbour, day after frustrating day, park his car neatly on the dividing line between two parking spaces, ensuring that for two whole days, his own car had to hang around unprotected on the road. When he could stand it no longer, he went and spoke politely to the man.

The next day, however, the car was still there. The householder decided on rough stuff. He brought down his son's tricycle and parked it right on the dividing line. The next day he looked out of his window and saw the offending car in status quo. Rushing out, he saw his tricycle under the status quo. He hollered for the neighbour who came down to find he had one friend less in the world. It turned out later that the reason why he was parking his car in the wrong place was that he had thought that another, fainter line in the middle of the next parking square was the correct one.

THE GOVERNMENT

Rajiv Gets Going

NEW BROOMS are supposed to sweep clean. And Rajiv Gandhi wielded his with great determination last fortnight in a flurry of activity last fortnight that suggested he took his mandate for change seriously. When the dust had eventually settled, a host of key government functionaries had been shifted around, some sent packing, ministries restructured, new committees set up to tackle knotty problems, and directives issued on a host of subjects that promised change, and more change. Nobody was left in any doubt that the young head of government meant to sweep cleaner than anyone had before him.

In an eventful first week in office, the prime minister set up a three-man ministerial committee to suggest a way out of the Punjab impasse, invited the leaders of the Assam student movement for talks, set up an expert panel to suggest a new education policy, and ordered the creation of a National Wastelands Development Board as well as a Central Ganga Authority. In a series of meetings with his newly appointed ministers and with senior bureaucrats, Rajiv Gandhi also made it clear that he expected results, and that he would give them very little time to achieve them.

That message went home very quickly, and there was a new air of urgency and businesslike purposiveness in government offices as both ministers and civil servants got down to the task of showing results. In the Industry Ministry, officials began work on a series of 'position papers' on how to speed up decisions on applications received from industry. Railway Minister Bansi Lal paid a surprise visit to the New Delhi railway station and suspended a lackadaisical enquiry clerk, his minister of state Madhavrao Scindia worked till midnight acquainting himself with his charge before heading for the airport at five the next morning to catch a flight. Minister of State for Steel K. Natwar Singh started off on a quick tour of the steel plants, and Education Minister K.C. Pant absent-mindedly made pencil sketches of turbanned faces on his blotter while sitting across from Punjab leaders who had come to discuss the Punjab problem.

The new broom reached into the Congress party office too, where Rajiv Gandhi appointed three new general secretaries, re-allocated the portfolios of the existing ones, and then appointed 10 new joint secretaries, most of them youngsters picked to present the face of youth and change.

Back in the Government, the prime minister set about reorganising the ministries as no one had done before him. The Telecommunications Department was de-linked from Posts and Telegraphs (giving effect to the three-year-old recommendation of the H.C.Sarin committee, and paving the way for a much greater flow of funds into telecommunications), the Department of Coal was tagged on to the Ministry of Steel and Mines in an effort to bring producer and user closer together, the Energy Ministry was split into four separate outfits, the Council of Scientific and Industrial Research (CSIR) converted into a Department of Scientific and Industrial Research, social welfare tagged on to women's welfare to form a new ministry, and forests taken away from agriculture and made a part of the Ministry of Environment because deforestation is a central environmental problem. Earlier, in November, he had made the Department of Company Affairs a part of the Industry Ministry, thus achieving a functional cohesion that had been recommended two years earlier by the Economic Administration Reforms Commission but lain unimplemented. The changes in personnel were as sweeping. Two members of the Planning Commission were sent packing, three others appointed, a new governor of the Reserve Bank named, India's nominees on the executive boards of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund replaced, the special assistant to the prime minister R.K. Dhawan asked to resign and a more self-effacing substitute put in his place, and sweeping orders issued to send back to the states all bureaucrats who had spent more than their alloted time in Delhi. Such orders had often been issued in the past, only for a series of exceptions to be made immediately after. But this time, when the Home Ministry sent an additional secretary's file to the prime minister for extending his posting in Delhi, the file came back with 'NO' written in capital letters.

Going beyond the changes in administrative structure and personnel, Rajiv Gandhi gave warning of wanting to bring about substantial changes in government policy in a host of fields. The public sector was served notice that it would have to perform or face the axe, bureaucrats were told that decisions would have to be taken at middle levels so that those at the top had time to think of policy and direction, and decisions taken in short order to visit both Moscow and Washington in the summer.

This wasn't just one broom sweeping clean, but more like a multi-tentacled eager beaver moving on as many fronts as possible, chopping, changing, ordering, pushing forward. And the hectic activity was in sharp contrast to the hesitant, careful manner in which he had donned his mother's mantle only two months earlier. Now that Rajiv Gandhi had a mandate, he also seemed to have a mission.

There was also plenty of evidence to show that Rajiv had been planning the changes and getting ready for office well ahead of the election results. Picking sensibly on the fact that change would have to start with the people who would have to bring about change, he had fixed on the government machinery and bureaucracy as the first target of attack.

Some time in November or December, he had asked a team of seasoned ex-bureaucrats comprising L.K. Jha, Gian Prakash (former comptroller and auditor general) and T.V. Rajeshwar (lt-governor of Arunachal Pradesh and former director of the Intelligence Bureau) to prepare a report for him on the restructuring of government departments. While Rajiv was criss-crossing the country drumming up the votes, these three had sat with G.K. Arora and V.S. Tripathi, two senior officers in the prime minister's secretariat, to review the working of the central ministries. What emerged was a preliminary report that led to the creation of new departments and the shuffling around of others within 24 hours of Rajiv's swearing in. Cabinet Secretary C.R.Krishnaswamy Rao Saheb eventually sent a 34-page official recommendation to President Zail Singh for issuing the necessary orders to get things going.

Some of the mood of action rubbed off on those immediately around. Finance Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh spent 18-hour days wrestling with what seemed a difficult budgetary position, but lost no time in ordering his officials to reopen investigations into a series of bank frauds that had hit the headlines in recent months, or into controversial dealings involving the Central Bank of India, Punjab National Bank, Punjab and Sind Bank and Bank of Baroda. Some controversial bank chairmen who came to pay courtesy calls were denied audience, and Singh declared: "We have started identifying the corrupt people occupying strategic positions. The corrupt and inefficient will be weeded out and the honest and efficient ones suitably rewarded." Singh also ordered a wholesale change of the bank directors whose terms were about to end.

Labour minister T. Anjaiah made pronouncements about housing programmes for members of the provident fund organisation, and Housing Minister Abdul Ghafoor turned the spotlight on the corruption-ridden Delhi Development Authority, and among the officials. Krishnaswamy Rao Saheb quickly adjusted to a new era under a prime minister who was also a computernik. He asked the heads of all government departments to visit an exhibition of modern office machines and to familiarise themselves with the workings of computers, word processors and similiar electronic efficiency aids. Rao Saheb himself inaugurated the exhibition. Not one to lag behind, V.P.Singh inaugurated a computerised information system for his ministry a few days later. Said the dapper Madhvrao Scindia, representing the new age by making ordinary khadi look like high fashion: "If we had a leader who trudged along, there would have been little enthusiasm on display as a consequence. But his speedy decisions have electrified us."

It remained to be seen, of course, whether the changes would finally amount to much, whether the broom would very quickly be put away, and whether one new man at the top could shake a government (and later a country) into a new desire for action and change. Mrs Gandhi had herself galvanised the government into quick bursts of activity on a number of occasions (when the emergency was declared in 1975, or in early 1981 when she announced a new 20-point programme and shuffled people around), but none of these had had lasting impact or led to permanent change. In fact, immediately after coming back to power in 1980, Mrs Gandhi had sent a hand-picked team to visit Assam and seek a solution there, but this ended up with the Nellie outrage three years later. The big question now was whether things would be different this time around.

One thing seemed immediately obvious in the corridors of government in Delhi: the sense of change was more at the top than lower down, where the broom had yet to reach. In the Planning Commission, an official complained that typists still insisted on getting overtime before typing out annual plan documents. In the industry ministry, a senior official talked once again of 'single-window clearance' and 'time-barred clearance of applications'—both hoary chestnuts that offered little new. In the prime minister's secretariat itself, a senior official complained that very few new ideas were coming in from the various ministries, that people were still thinking along traditional lines, serving up old salads with a new dressing. And in a time-honoured tactic by a new minister who does not have too many fresh ideas, Education Minister K.C.Pant served notice that his ministry's entrance doors would close by 10.30, so that late-comers were shut out.

Nevertheless, there was no mistaking the immediate change of style, pace, and to some extent even direction. Law Minister Asoke Sen declared that high court judges would not be shuffled around at will, as his predecessor in Mrs Gandhi's cabinet had done. Social Welfare Minister Mohsina Kidwai announced that all children would be completely immunised in the next five years (against only 55 per cent of children having immunisation cover now). And the squalid squabbling that had gone on between A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chowdhury and C.K.Jaffer Sharief in Rail Bhavan now gave way to mutual Lucknowi courtesy between Bansi Lal and Madhavrao Scindia: "Pahle aap, nahin pahle aap" (you first, no please you first). Bansi Lal in fact seemed mellower than the tyrant of yore, while others with a mellower reputation breathed fire: Minister of State for Commerce P.A. Sangma quietly threatened the mandarins in Udyog Bhavan that if he was dropped from the ministry for non-performance, he would take at least a couple of them down with him. Even as knee-jerk a Nehru/Gandhi-baiter as the octogenarian opposition leader Charan Singh was forced to concede that the new Government had begun well.

The handling of the Opposition marked another departure from the confrontationist postures of the past. Rajiv Gandhi called in opposition leaders individually or in small groups for informal consultations. Many of those consulted saw in this a new welcome trend towards a conciliatory style. However, Mrs Gandhi too had occasionally called in op-

PM'S SECRETARIAT

New Blood

IT WAS both continuity and change in the Prime Minister's Secretariat as well. Last fortnight, when Rajiv Gandhi returned to South Block with an unprecedented electoral victory, he ordered both qualitative and quantitative change in the 200-member Prime Minister's Secretariat. Though he retained over half-a-dozen senior civil servants including his Principal Secretary Dr P.C. Alexander and the controversial advisor Vijay Shankar Tripathi, he gave marching orders to Rajinder Kumar Dhawan, his mother's aide for more than 14 years, and over six junior-level officials. He then replaced his special secretary Dr Arjun Sengupta with another Oxford-educated bureaucrat, Montek Singh Ahluwalia.

But the most significant change in the prime minister's office was the induction of two more parliamentary secretaries—Ahmed Mohamed Patel and Oscar Fernandes, both Congress(I) MP's. Last month Rajiv had already inducted his Doon School pal Arun Singh as parliamentary secretary. Though Rajiv has always given an impression that he is in favour of decentralisation of the decision-making process, the induction of three parliamentary secretaries in the prime minister's office suggests that he is expected to keep a close vigil over the entire government. Manned by a principal secretary and eight officials of the rank of joint secretary and above, the present Prime Minister's Secretariat has now become one of the biggest secretariats since Independence. Rajiv's advisors justify such a top heavy administration on the plea that the prime minister is likely to initiate far-reaching economic and social reforms in the near future, and his secretariat will serve as nodal point for all result-oriented activities of the Government.

Moreover, the prime minister believes that he should not depend entirely on bureaucratic advice only. The presence of political advisors will help in getting reports through the party forums and enable him to cross-check the claims put up by the bureaucracy.

Changes in the secretariat also reflect a significant shift in emphasis in Rajiv's governmental policy and attitude towards the bureaucracy. By inducting three young politicians who carry no ideological baggage, Rajiv has indicated that he himself has an open mind. In addition, by retaining bureaucrats like Alexander, Additional Secretary Gopi Arora, Joint Secretary Arvind Pandey and by appointing Ahluwalia—all of whom have a solid background in economics—he has clearly expressed that his priority is for economic policies.

Even in the retention of people like Tripathi, H.Y. Sharda Prasad and Usha Bhagat, the prime minister has conveyed a clear message: he's not for wholesale axing of incumbents but will continue to take their advice in matters which they are handling.

Though the newcomers are yet to settle in their saddles, INDIA TODAY profiles the fresh entrants to the Prime Minister's Secretariat.

Oscar Fernandes: Karnataka-born Oscar Fernandes, 44, is an aggressive politician. A graduate from Karnataka University, Fernandes concentrated on farming in Udupi where he earned laurels for being a modern farmer. He was awarded a prize by the Government for the highest yield of rice from his farm. But Fernandes shot to political prominence in 1980, when he was chosen by Sanjay Gandhi to contest the Lok Sabha seat from Udupi on a Congress(I) ticket. He won the seat by polling over 60 per cent of the total votes.

While maintaining a low profile in New Delhi, Fernandes was active in his home state where he played an important role in the reorganisation of the party. After Sanjay's death, he came in close contact with both Rajiv Gandhi and Arun Nehru, who inducted him as member of the National Council of the Indian Youth Congress(I). Earlier, in 1983, he was involved in planning training camps from the Congress(I)'s frontal organisations like the Congress Sewa Dal, the Mahila Congress, and the National Students Union of India. When Rajiv took over as AICC(I) general secretary, Fernandes was inducted as one of the joint secretaries to assist him in organisational matters.

As Rajiv's aide, Fernandes was responsible for coordinating the activities of the organisations. Though he looked after youth organisations, he kept out of controversy. Working for over 18 hours a day, Fernandes carried out Rajiv's instructions faithfully and monitored the progress of the programmes given to all the organisations. People who have worked closely with him say he is level-headed and never loses his cool even in the most trying circumstances he sometimes has to face.

Ahluwalia: pragmatic approach

Since Fernandes had earlier established direct rapport with Congress(I) MP's, including those who were new, Rajiv assigned him to look after the prime minister's Parliament work. According to sources, all the files relating to parliamentary affairs will be routed through Fernandes instead of Tripathi.

Ahmed Mohamed Patel: For 35-year-old Patel, it has been an impressive journey from village pradhan to parliamentary secretary to the prime minister. Born to a Muslim Congressman of Piraman village in Broach district of Gujarat, Patel has always been shy of publicity. Short and handsome, he began his social activities as a philanthropist in 1975 when he was nominated as trustee of a Muslim educational trust in Ankleshwar. When he was only 28, Sanjay Gandhi chose him as the Congress(I) candidate from Broach parliamentary constituency which he won with a considerably huge margin.

When the Gujarat Congress deserted Mrs Gandhi after the 1978 split, Sanjay inducted Patel as president of the Gujarat State Youth Congress(I), a post which he held till 1980. During the two years of the Janata regime, Patel made his party's presence felt by leading protest marches. In 1980 he was renominated for contesting the Lok Sabha election and came into contact with Rajiv later that year when he, along with other Youth Congress(I) leaders, called on him and pledged their cooperation. In 1982, Rajiv inducted Patel as one of the AICC(I)'s joint secretaries and assigned him to look after publicity and coordination. He was also responsible for coordinating Rajiv's tour programme in the various states.

Soon after Rajiv's appointment as General Secretary, it was Patel who along with other key officials finalised his tours to various states.

It is perhaps Patel's coolheadedness which weighed with Rajiv for inducting Patel as his parliamentary secretary to look after party affairs. Though his role has not been defined fully so far, he will act as an intermediary between the party and the prime minister. While the AICC(I)'s general secretaries will continue to have direct access to the prime minister, most of the organisational decisions will be conveyed through Patel, who is also expected to ensure that the prime minister's directions are carried out smoothly and expeditiously. Says Patel: "Rajiv has reposed confidence in me. My job is to carry out his orders and instructions faithfully to the best of my ability."

V.S. Venkatraman: A Brahmin from Tamil Nadu, Venkatraman, 49, is perhaps the first faceless, low-profile bureaucrat to join the Prime Minister's Secretariat as special assistant to the prime minister. Last fortnight, when he moved into a modestly furnished first floor room in South Block, he presented a contrast to the previous occupants like M.O. Mathai and R.K. Dhawan who between them remained in that office for over 15 years. Though Venkatraman had worked with various ministers including prime minister Lal Bahadur Shastri for over 11 years, he was never a subject of media interest.

He began his government service in the early '60s with Lal Bahadur Shastri as one of his personal assistants. Later on he was selected in the central secretariat services competition, and joined the Central Government as a section officer. During the past 18 years, he has worked in various ministries including those of energy, transport, shipping and home affairs. In 1980, he was inducted as private secretary to P. Venkatsubbaiah, Union minister of state for home. Between 1980 and 1983, he came in close touch with the Prime Minister's Secretariat for consultation on various personnel matters. In 1983, he was promoted as joint secretary and posted in the Ministry of Shipping and Transport.

Montek Singh Ahluwalia: Delhi Public School and Oxford educated Ahluwalia, 42, is the first Sikh to join the prime minister's fledgeling secretariat since Independence. Last fortnight, he replaced Dr Arjun Sengupta as economic advisor in the rank of additional secretary to the prime minister. Ahluwalia's induction followed the Rajiv Government's conscious decision to minimise controls over the economy. While Sengupta was assessed as a leftist, Ahluwalia enjoys the reputation of being pragmatic and opposed to unnecessary controls. A soft-spoken man, Ahluwalia is one of a dozen non-IAS officials who occupy senior positions in the Finance Ministry, which he joined during the Janata regime in 1979.

Before joining the Government, Ahluwalia worked first as an economist and later on as chief of the income distribution division of the Development Research Centre of the World Bank in the US. During the past five years at North Block he has been associated with the formulation of fiscal and monetary policies. As economic advisor to the Finance Ministry, Ahluwalia's major responsibility was to assess the implications of various economic policies and suggest alternatives for faster economic growth.

Since Ahluwalia has contributed academic research papers on income distribution in reputed economic periodicals, he is considered an expert on public finance and rural poverty. Unless the prime minister reallocates the work, Ahluwalia will look after the economic ministries and advise the prime minister on economic matters. His induction at the crucial moment when both the budget and the seventh plan are being finalised is viewed as a shift towards a control-free economy. —PRABHU CHAWLA position representatives for consultations, but these had not amounted to much. And it remained to be seen what Rajiv Gandhi's exercises would amount to. Nevertheless, the beginning undoubtedly did spell promise.

The question now remained to be answered, as to what the new initiatives would amount to. Good intentions were certainly on display, even in little personal habits like K.C.Pant's: the education minister sat in his large dark office with all the lights switched off. Some fading daylight and the winter chill filtered in through the open windows. "I am a conservationist," Pant explained to curious visitors. Only when dusk approached did he order the lights to be switched on. But what did such personal examples eventually amount to?

Many bureaucrats, while welcoming the new business-like air, wondered whether the transfers, sackings and appointments would create only surface turbulence, and said changes of greater substance would have to wait for a sharp definition of perspectives and policies. Said political commentator Romesh Thapar: "Political stability is not made by massive mandates. The ruling party may have all the votes in Parliament, but if it does not have the courage and integrity to restructure the system, the system will keep caving in." Thapar then pointed to the fact that those guilty of perpetrating the riots in Delhi had not yet been brought to book: "We are becoming terribly forgetful about justice at the pyramid of power, and the consequences that flow from such forgetfulness."

There was also a sense of disappointment among those who discussed the Punjab problem with members of the three-man committee set up by the prime minister. Said a Congress(I) leader from Punjab: "We are being told the same things once again about linking the future of Fazilka and Abohar with that of Chandigarh, and we are also hearing the same old arguments that brought about the current impasse in the first place." Punjab in fact seemed likely to be a difficult knot to cut through, with a variety of Akali leaders continuing to swear by the Anandpur Sahib Resolution, and laying down a variety of pre-conditions that would have to be met before talks could start. And matters were not simplified by Haryana Chief Minister Bhajan Lal sounding a warning about resistance to any scheme that would deprive the state of both Chandigarh and river waters while getting nothing in return.

Assam, however, presented a more hopeful scenario. The leaders of the All Assam Students Union (AASU) were invited to Delhi for fresh negotiations with the Government, and those who spoke to them reported a more flexible frame of mind than had been in evidence in the past. The AASU leaders might be persuaded to accept the 1971 cut-off date that the Government itself had once offered for determining who was an alien and who wasn't, and also seemed inclined to participate in Assembly elections in the state if they were held in March. While several tricky issues still remained to be sorted out, the picture here was not as difficult as the one in Punjab, and it seemed possible that the new Government would, if it moved dexterously, be able to show a major triumph here in the near future.

On the economic front, the signals

An enormous amount of work needed to be done if genuine changes were to be ushered in by the new government on a wide front. Indeed, the flurry of activity in the government's first week in office only built up expectations of more action...

were mixed. On the one hand, there was the impression created that perennially loss-incurring public sector units might be wound up so that good money was not thrown after bad, and reports submitted earlier for winding up eight textile mills under the National Textile Corporation umbrella were dusted off for a fresh look. However, the Government had to beat a hasty retreat over the sacking of a few hundred casual railway employees in Bengal. These had been hired in the first place as a part of the then Railway Minister Ghani Khan Chowdhury's porkbarrel politics, and the employees' services had been dispensed with as soon as the railway minister changed. But an enormous to-do resulted in Calcutta and Malda, where effigies of Rajiv Gandhi were burnt, and the Government backtracked hastily. This only begged the question of how a government that could not dismiss casual workers would be able to get rid of permanent employees in public sector corporations.

ON THE education front too, the instant talk of delinking jobs from degrees seemed more of a slogan than a practical solution to a difficult problem. If the objective was to ease the pressure on universities, it was unlikely to be achieved since there were not enough job opportunities available as an alternative outlet for school-leavers. Also, the background and experience of the experts who were asked to draft a new education policy suggested that the focus would be on university education more than on primary and adult education.

A large question-mark also hung over the government's industrial policy. For while officials talked enthusiastically of 'single window clearance' and of working on new position papers that would define policy options for the new Government, there seemed little chance that radical departures would be attempted immediately. After all, single window clearance still meant getting clearances for the project, the foreign collaboration involved, the capital goods import required, clearance from the viewpoint of the law governing large houses, plus downstream negotiations for land, tax concessions from the state government, money from the government-owned financial institutions, and much else. There was little chance that all this would be gone through in double-quick time, and delays in government offices seemed likely to continue. The option of dispensing with the control apparatus and replacing it with a new one that stipulated what the Government would and would not allow, without the need for case by case clearances, was not yet being considered despite Rajiv Gandhi telling an American interviewer that the Government's objective was to put an end to controls without giving up control.

However, the prime minister's instincts were finely tuned when he told commerce ministry officials that the only way to end corruption was to reduce the need for contact between ministry officials and supplicants who came to them for a variety of approvals and clearances. And while his holding on to both the industry and commerce ministries seemed an undue and impractical concentration of major portfolios in one man's hands, it was also clear that this had been done with the specific purpose of devoting time and attention to initiating change in two vital areas.

Similarly, the delinking of the department of personnel from the Home Mini-

However, it was also clear that no government could meet very high expectations on short order, and that there would inevitably be a let-down as the days and weeks passed. But the message had been imparted that the new boss meant business.

stry, and placing it under a minister of state whom the prime minister trusted and who would report to the prime minister, seemed designed to initiate substantial changes in the weeks to come. The minister of state concerned, K.P.Singh Deo, tended to speak in cliches ("Rajiv wants civil servants to be more responsive to the needs of modern India"), but it seemed likely that the steps taken would be less cliched.

Several tasks would have to be taken on quickly if a change in the administrative culture was to take place. While Rajiv Gandhi talked of giving public sector managers greater autonomy and then making them accountable, the head of a large public sector company termed the steps initiated so far as 'bakwas' (nonsense). "I have seen joint secretaries playing hell with the public sector without the faintest idea of what they were about," he said. "The whole culture of ministerial control over the public sector is wrong." A technocrat, meanwhile, pointed out that only two of the 32 economic secretaries to the Government were professional managers, while another six were technical men. The remaining 24 came from the Indian Administrative Service (IAS) or other generalist services. "Unless this kind of situation changes, economic management and public sector performance cannot improve," he said.

That comment underlined two things: the enormous amount of work that needed to be done if genuine change was to be ushered in by the new Government on a wide front, and the fact that people expected the new Government to make a serious bid for such change. Indeed, the flurry of activity in the government's first week in office only built up expectations of more action.

However, it was also clear that no government could meet very high expectations in short order, and that there would inevitably be a let-down as the days and weeks passed. But what encouraged hope last fortnight was the fact that the Government was setting the stage for changes in policy and direction by setting up think-tanks, ordering a review of existing policies, creating new agencies that would pay attention to urgent problems, and much else. Also, the message had been imparted that the new boss meant business. As the country looked forward to a new quinquennium, the key question was whether these initiatives would result in genuine departures, or whether the new broom would quickly lose its efficacy.

PRANAB MUKHERJEE

Up in Smoke

HE IS a midget-sized man who cast a long shadow on Mrs Gandhi's government. Last fortnight, when Pranab Mukherjee's three-year-long tenure as finance minister came to an abrupt end, he left a lot more than a whiff of his favourite Erinmore tobacco in the corridors of North Block.

The exact reason behind the axing of the suave but high-flying Mukherjee, 49, as well as that of the all-powerful Special Assistant to the Prime Minister, R.K. Dhawan, may long remain shrouded in mystery with all the concerned parties taking shelter behind the convenient reply: "It's the prime minister's prerogative." But, while Dhawan's ouster was entirely expected (see box), what really got eyebrows raised was the manner of Mukherjee's surgical excision, performed with a blunt scalpel and without anaesthesia.

On December 31, shortly before the new cabinet was sworn in, Mukherjee had put up a beaming face standing next to the prime minister before television cameras when the Congress(I) parliamentary party formally chose Rajiv as the leader. Within hours, M.L. Fotedar, the prime minister's aide, was ringing up prospective ministers asking them to get ready for the swearing in at Rashtrapati Bhawan. However, the phone at Mukherjee's spacious bungalow on Jantar Mantar Road never rang. At 5 p.m., barely 15 minutes before the swearing in, he drafted a letter to the Works and Housing Ministry requesting to be shifted to a smaller bungalow, "now that I am no longer a member of the Union Cabinet", and settled before the television set with wife Shubhra to watch the proceedings of the evening.

The axing was deliberately unceremonious. Even A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chowdhury, the former railway minister and fellow-Bengali whose hostility to Mukherjee is well-known, was called aside by Rajiv before the formation of the ministry and was offered a general secretaryship of the All India Congress(I) Committee (AICC-I) in lieu of a place in the Cabinet. But there was not even a by-your-leave in the case of Mukherjee. And, rubbing salt into the wound, the prime minister told newsmen later in the evening that he was considering neither a party posting nor any ambass-

"Crêpe de Chines, literally crêpes of China, have stood for the highest standard of luxury in pure silk. Our Fuji De Chine and Crêpe De Chine series in 50% polyester is inspired by the classical silk crêpe original.

Chinese royalty wore silks for a few thousand years before their master weavers could present them with the 'Crêpe de Chine'. Since then, crêpes have represented the finest skill and technique of the weaver and his loom.

At our new fabric making complex at Vareli, one out of every eight trained weavers is selected to be a proud De Chine weaver. Made through a difficult combination of separately treated warp and weft, what makes a De Chine special is its half-matte-half-shiny crêpe appeal and its non-slip silky drape. Its muted sheen and natural fall render it indistinguishable from pure silk crêpes.

The road to a great De Chine isn't easy but that's the road we've taken. And why not?

Does the Indian woman deserve any less?"

adorial appointment for Mukherjee.

There was still no let-up in the executioner's rituals. Within a week, Mukherjee was removed from his elevated post as leader of the Rajya Sabha. The other two exclusive clubs of the party, the Congress(I) Working Committee (CWC) and the Congress(I) Parliamentary Board (CPB), of which he became a member by virtue of his leadership of the Rajya Sabha, seemed destined to blackball him at the time of their reconstitution, likely soon. "What can I say? The prime minister has dropped me, and that's all. In a parliamentary system it's the prerogative of the prime minister to choose his Cabinet," Mukherjee told INDIA TODAY, putting up a brave front but sounding exhausted. He was packing to leave for a quiet week-end at the guest house of Kurukshetra University in Haryana.

Generally wary of publicity, good or bad, Mukherjee received a raw deal in the hands of his adversaries even after being ejected from office. One such instance was the 'story' planted in the media after Mrs Gandhi's death, that Mukherjee had mentioned in the flight from Calcutta to Delhi before Rajiv on that fateful day that being the seniormost cabinet member he should be sworn in as the acting prime minister on the model of Gulzarilal Nanda in 1964 and 1966. Even Shyamlal Yadav, then deputy chairman of the Rajya Sabha, who was also on the flight said that "nothing of that sort ever happened." Apprehensions about Mukherjee in the new power set-up were also fuelled by speculations in the foreign media about his chances of being chosen as Mrs Gandhi's successor vis-a-vis Rajiv for many hours after the assassination. The media cannot be blamed, for they were trying to anticipate the current situation in the light of past conventions.

The removal of Mukherjee created a flutter in the echelons of power because everybody expected him to fade away slowly, not to disappear suddenly from the scene. "It's too sudden to believe," said a senior executive in the Finance Ministry. But he was on a downhill path immediately after Rajiv became the Prime Minister on the day of Mrs Gandhi's assassination, ironically on the strength of the CPB resolution drafted by Mukherjee. The plain fact is that Rajiv could never pull along with Mukherjee.

He rose fast in the Government despite this. Unsuccessful twice over at the hustings (he has never won an election), Mrs Gandhi nevertheless chose him as her commerce and steel minister in 1980, making him the Rajya Sabha leader, and taking him on board virtually every committee of the Cabinet, including the powerful Cabinet Committee on Political Affairs (CCPA).

He then replaced R. Venkataraman as the finance minister and continued by common consent, to function as the number two minister in 1982. Mrs Gandhi herself put the seal of approval on the pecking order by leaving instructions before her foreign trips to ask Mukherjee to preside over the cabinet meetings in her absence. In fact, Mukherjee's rank was decided as soon as he became the leader of the Rajya Sabha, within a week of his being appointed a cabinet minister. Mukherjee, though only 45 then, and without the experience of having been either a cabinet minister or a chief minister before was taking precedence over veterans like P.V. Narasimha Rao, Kamlapati Tripathi, Vidya Charan Shukla and Venkataraman.

Mukherjee with Mrs Gandhi in 1977: symbol of the past

BUT MUKHERJEE'S great quality lay in the fact that he wore his success lightly, never projecting himself to the outside world and never giving an impression of wielding power independent of Mrs Gandhi. There was so perfect a harmony between him and Mrs Gandhi that partymen soon began to regard his words as the faithful voice reproduction of Mrs Gandhi's. This was repeatedly seen during the convoluted course of the Antulay affair. Mrs Gandhi kept in touch with her aberrant supporter in Bombay almost entirely through Mukherjee. Again, when Jagannath Mishra needed to be politely told to step down, it was Mukherjee who flew down to Patna to deliver the message. Antulay told INDIA TODAY before leaving the Congress(I): "I could never trust men like G.K. Moopanar or Arun Nehru. These people put their own words in Mrs Gandhi's mouth. Pranab Mukherjee is the only person who never does that."

However, insiders recall that immediately below the level of Mrs Gandhi, power was for some time flowing along two channels —one of them being guarded by the Mukherjee-Dhawan axis and their intricate network of 'contacts' among the bureaucracy and the state chief ministers; and the other channel furrowed afresh, being sluiced by Rajiv and his band of aides and friends. Obviously the twain could never meet.

The flashpoint came in 1983 when Mukherjee began backing to the hilt the attempts of Swraj Paul, the London-based corporate raider, to buy substantially into two blue-chip Indian companies, Escorts and (DCM), both with a new generation of leaders who were contemporaries of Rajiv in the elite Doon School. Paul, on the other hand, stood by Mrs Gandhi when she was thrown out of power, and his clout in the bureaucratic and business circles in India always derived its substance from his being close to 1, Safdarjung Road.

Paul's forays into the Escorts and DCM stocks were triggered by a crucial decision in the 1983-84 budget, framed by Mukherjee, which enabled Non-Resident Indians (NRI's) to invest in Indian companies subject to certain conditions. Once the scheme was announced, Paul moved in with lightning speed, his brokers, operating at his behest, cornering shares worth Rs 13 crore from the market in the two companies even before their managements could say Paul.

Mukherjee was initially reluctant to put any limit on NRI holdings in Indian companies. But the 'second' centre of power had woken up by then. Rajiv, participating in the budget debate, mentioned a limit of just 2 per cent. A chastened Mukherjee had to eat his words and announce a 5 per cent limit in Parliament. Some time later, Rajiv set at rest all doubt as to who the real boss was when he told a meeting of NRI's in Delhi that the Government "should not be a party" to "internal matters" of companies, such as suggesting which share transfers they should register and which they should not.

That precisely was the thorny point in the debate, arising out of the refusal of the Escorts and DCM managements to register the transfer of shares in favour of Paul's Caparo group of companies. But, instead of seeing the writing on the wall, Mukherjee went further down his chosen road and overruled the Reserve Bank of India (RBI) in allowing Paul's companies to buy in India.

In a blatant show of strength, the Life Insurance Corporation of India (LIC) and other financial institutions, all creatures of the Finance Ministry, later sought to remove nine of Escorts' 15 directors. Finally, in a historic judgement last November, the Bombay High Court stalled the move and held that Paul's companies had violated the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act (FERA) in buying the shares without RBI clearance. Though the LIC immediately challenged this in the Supreme Court, to be joined later by the RBI and the Union Government, it was indeed the last straw that broke Mukherjee's back.

"I don't think the NRI policy was authored entirely by me; it was a policy of the Government and the ruling party of which our present prime minister was a general secretary at that time," Mukherjee says now, adding that "I've never tried to draw any distinction between one company and another." Nor does he accept that the Paul fiasco represented "any kind of watershed" in his relationship with Rajiv. Yet why did he fail to click with Rajiv? Mukherjee, without answering the question, merely resorts to the reticent pipe-smoker's subterfuge—that of gently tapping the tobacco.

That he was feeling apprehensive about his future even in Mrs Gandhi's lifetime is evident from the fact that he requested Asoke Sen, law minister, who was just an MP then, to vacate the Calcutta north-west Lok Sabha seat, always a Congress(I) citadel, in his favour in exchange of a place in the Rajya Sabha. Sen wrote back to Mrs Gandhi asking her if that was her real wish. Mrs Gandhi reportedly said it wasn't so.

This alone should have served as an early warning to Mukherjee, because it was in stark contrast to the VIP treatment laid out for him earlier in 1981 when his term in the Rajya Sabha had ended but the Congress(I) in the West Bengal Assembly did not have sufficient strength to re-elect him. Ready to oblige Mukherjee, the Gujarat Chief Minister, Madhavsinh Solanki, then secured a Rajya Sabha seat for him from the state Assembly with a certificate of residence in Ahmedabad made available to him to comply with the election rules.

AFTER Mrs Gandhi's death, events moved too fast for Mukherjee even to make an effort for a comeback. His early request for a ticket from the Howrah constituency in West Bengal, which was later on won by the Congress(I), was summarily rejected. Barring only a few, the claims of all ticket-seekers belonging to his faction in the state's Congress(I) politics were overruled. And, to spite him further, Khan Chowdhury, his anathema for the last five years, was nominated on the CPB by Rajiv. "Pranabda should have realised then and there that his days were numbered," said Subrata Mukherjee, West Bengal Congress(I) MLA and his trusted lieutenant.

However, Mukherjee is undoubtedly among the more competent finance ministers India has had since Independence; Finance Ministry officials put him in the same bracket with C. Subramaniam.

R.K. DHAWAN

Inning's End

RAJENDER Kumar Dhawan, the dapper 47-year-old special assistant (SA) to the prime minister, after having clung to Mrs Gandhi like her shadow for 22 years, when she was both in and out of office, finally paid the price of his proximity to power. It was business as usual for Dhawan, even on December 31, when Rajiv and his cabinet were sworn in at the Rashtrapati Bhawan. He stood near the prime minister, not too close, yet in full glare of the television cameras. But, within hours, the names of members of the reconstituted prime minister's secretariat were on the ticker: Dhawan had been dropped.

There were other changes too in the prime minister's staff: such as the retirement of M.M. Sharma, first personal assistant to the prime minister, the reverting of two assistants, R.K. Sikri and Y.S. Dave, to other government departments; the retirement of K.P. Mathur personal physician to the prime minister, and the termination of service of Nathu Ram, the 68-year-old personal attendant to Mrs Gandhi.

But these were reduced to some insignificant trade-off in personnel compared to the news of the ouster of Dhawan, the man who accompanied Mrs Gandhi literally till she breathed her last. "I don't know why I was dropped. Frankly speaking, it is not my business either to know the reason because my job is coterminous with the prime minister. And, I've no regrets," Dhawan told INDIA TODAY, dressed as always in a well-pressed suit, a cigarette held rakishly between his clenched teeth, and standing in the sunlit lawn of his rented house at Delhi's posh Golf Links.

It is true that Dhawan's word was law to most in the Congress(I), either in the Government or in the party, when Mrs Gandhi was alive. But there is no proof that he had usurped the line of command: even the Shah Commission could not prove that. He was all along Mrs Gandhi's proverbial cat's paw, and the image was so discernible that Rajiv could not but remove him if he wanted to project a new image for himself.

Dhawan's strongest point, as Mrs Gandhi herself told a US National Broadcasting Corporation (NBC) network television interviewer during the 1977-80 Janata period, was that he was an "insomniac". He trailed Mrs Gandhi from 8 in the morning, when she appeared for the morning darshan, often till midnight. Except Nathu Ram, no member of Mrs Gandhi's personal staff could claim such long association with her: he was chosen by her when he was only 25 and working as a stenographer in the commerce ministry pool. Mrs Gandhi, then not in Government, needed his help in organising a trade fair in New York. In the 1977 elections, when the Congress(I) was voted out of power, Dhawan quit his government job and joind Mrs Gandhi's personal staff.

Rajiv felt apprehensive about Dhawan because his real powers far exceeded that of an SA who, according to service rules, should fix appointments, arrange tours, sort out mail, and use his discretion to select files and to put them up. But Dhawan had a qualification which very few SA's have: he knew his employer extremely well.

This knowledge of Mrs Gandhi's likes and dislikes, and her changing moods, enabled him to push his favourites and to curb those whom he did not finance minister between 1974 and 1977, but say that "Mukherjee had a better political judgement". Euromoney, the widely acclaimed money journal published from New York, described Mukherjee as one of the world's five best finance ministers and mentioned as one of his major achievements India's success in attaining a high rate of growth without running into major debt or balance of payments problem.

The economists who worked with him, one and all, pay tribute to him for "resilience of mind" and his "openness to ideas". Unlike during the stewardship of the ministry by Venkataraman, a highly respected finance minister but often slow to react, Mukherjee was able to galvanise the entire ministry into action and to introduce a continuous and two-way dialogue with the experts. As a result, he never flinched from taking an unpleasant decision as long as it made economic sense. For instance, in 1984-85, the poll-eve year, he unhesitatingly took a host of hard decisions, such as raising issue prices of wheat, sugar and rice, and cutting back on both Plan and non-Plan expenditure because money supply was increasing and prices showed a rising trend.

Of course he was favoured by two good monsoons in his three years and his personal achievement, as in the case of all finance ministers, is linked with the achievement of the entire economy. But even the bad year of 1982-83 showed a positive rate of growth while inflation was curbed to 9 per cent. The inflation rate came down later to 6 per cent. The Plan expenditure grew by 25 per cent in each year of Mukherjee's tenure. A process of cleaning up the tax system was started. And India did not have to borrow further from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) after drawing US $3.9 billion of the sanctioned US $5 billion.

His acknowledged competence as a financial administrator, however, does not wash away the aberrations that were simultaneously setting in public finance, the Paul episode being just one part of it. There were more such instances:

► the tussle between the RBI and the Finance Ministry in 1983 over permitting the Gulf-based and Pakistani-managed Bank of Credit and Commerce International (BCCI) to open its branch in Bombay. Manmohan Singh, erstwhile RBI governor, was of the view that the permission should not be given, but when the Finance Ministry pressed for it and even threatened to take away RBI's licensing power, he wanted to resign. Finally the Finance Ministry prevailed and Singh had to backtrack, issuing the necessary licence to BCCI.

► Two nationalised banks, Syndicate Bank and Central Bank of India, were dragged into scandals that indicated violation of banking norms under political pressure.

► Vast sums were distributed as bank credit to the economically weaker sections—without proper verification—in public relations exercises of the ruling party euphemistically dubbed loan melas.

However, it is neither Mukherjee's proven competence, nor the amoral flexibility of his policies, that seem to have weighed with Rajiv in deciding upon his removal. And his contacts in the party, including among some of the 'dissidents', were increasingly becoming a liability for him instead of being any boon. The loyalists thought him to be a bridge between the old and the new. But the newcomers did not quite trust him.

Cautious and suave, Mukherjee is too much of a bhadralok to have posed any real threat to Rajiv, or even to drop a hint ever that he would indeed like to be in the race. He was a symbol of a past that Rajiv wished to get away from. As the order of the round-table ended, he had to slip out of the limelight. —SUMIT MITRA like. In the last five years, Mrs Gandhi introduced a system of checks and balances in her secretariat, such as appointing M.L. Fotedar as her aide on party matters, and assigning to Vijay Shankar Tripathi, an IAS officer, the job of her political advisor. Still Dhawan managed to outsmart others for two reasons: he was greatly trusted by Mrs Gandhi, more than anyone else in the secretariat; and many partymen thought that Dhawan's word gave a true representation of Mrs Gandhi's views. Many state chief ministers, always anxious to know their stocks with the prime minister, dealt directly with Dhawan.

Dhawan: long day's journey into night

There were always strong lobbies working against Dhawan. His relations with Tripathi, for that matter, were openly hostile. But Mrs Gandhi deftly divided their areas of operation in order to avoid any confrontation. And, she seldom trusted anyone else so deeply on personal matters: it was Dhawan who, at Mrs Gandhi's behest, kept a line of communication open with Menaka even after she had left her mother-in-law's house, regularly enquiring about Pheroze Varun, Sanjay's son, even reaching him the presents sent by his doting grandmother.

Dhawan's utility to Mrs Gandhi stemmed from the characteristic style of her functioning and personality. Her authority was centralised and Dhawan was the only person who guarded access to her—by shifting appointments, by regulating allocations of time, even going to the extent of shutting off visitors not approved by him.

Sanjay too had a strong personal rapport with Dhawan, as a result of which he could make such deep inroads into the day-to-day functioning of the Government during the Emergency. But Dhawan was never a favourite of Rajiv because, after joining poilitics, Rajiv put together his own network of aides.

Dhawan could still retain his job on the strength of his competence, but it is clear his past image—that of a confidante of the late prime minister in the penumbra of power—got in the way of Rajiv showing any mercy to him. For a while after Rajiv assumed power on October 31 last year, Dhawan tried to keep alive the illusion of his closeness to the seat of power. He shadowed the new prime minister just as he'd have done his predecessor and, even when he was not wanted by Rajiv, he would report for duty to P.C. Alexander, principal secretary to the prime minister. But the rules of the game had changed irreversibly by then and it was a matter of time till the axe finally came down on him.

OPPOSITION

Out in the Wilderness

LAMPOONIST Abu Abraham visualised it as a half-erect, early homo-sapien with a wooden club, a creature of Darwinian dimensions preserved in a museum. The label read Homo Oppositinus Indicus while a visitor reading from a catalogue remarked: "Presumed extinct, it says here."

India's national opposition may not yet have reached that extreme stage of antiquation but last fortnight, still shell-shocked from their electoral debacle, having been crushed to bits by the mighty hand of the Congress(I), they seemed pretty close to it. Statistically, their recent and embarrassing consignment to the political wilderness was their most devastating set-back in Indian political history. If it weren't such a serious matter, the humiliation of the national opposition parties, mainly the Janata Party, the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) and the Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party (DMKP), would be laughable. Consider the facts:

► These three parties together put up no fewer than 598 candidates for the 508 constituencies that went to the polls. They won just 15.

► Their share of the national vote plummetted to a mere 21.12 per cent, barely two-fifths of what the Congress(I) cornered.

► Together with the two communist parties, the mainline opposition parties managed to get only 29.18 per cent of the national vote compared with a much more respectable 42.8 per cent they cornered in the 1980 poll.

► Worst of all, with the exception of the DMKP's Chowdhary Charan Singh, the electorate roundly rejected the top functionaries of all other national opposition parties, men whom Mrs Indira Gandhi had once derided as just so many prime ministers in waiting.

Understandably then, there was subdued despair at party headquarters, a prevailing sense of confusion among the ranks rolling in for hurriedly called huddles to discuss the debacle. Asked BJP MP Jaswant Singh: "Tell me have we seen the worst now or will there be further humiliation for us in the assembly elections?" The opposition parties are now, with the exception of 1977, getting used to a drubbing every five years. But the shock and confusion was all the worse for, in the eyes of the opposition stalwarts, a streak of disbelief was clearly discernible. "Ask press correspondents who accompanied me on my election tours," says an incredulous Charan Singh, making the point that from the voters' response during the campaign he never had any idea of the disaster that lay in wait.

Each passing day, however, brought its own dose of realism, and the fog of incomprehension was last fortnight at last slowly lifting. The waking up process began with a series of stock-taking sessions in Delhi at the highest levels of the opposition parties. The Janata Party was first off the mark with what was quickly dubbed a "mourning session", but it involved only the Central Parliamentary Board. The party took the result with a sense of resignation but, as former MP Syed Shahabuddin said: "We certainly wish to be awakened." General Secretary Surendra Mohan was more circumspect when he argued that it had been an abnormal election in the wake of an assassination, and that there was nothing to panic about.

As party conclaves went, the most serious one was a three-day affair of the BJP in the Parliament Annexe when leaders trooped in from all over to dissect the results. Top level leaders admitted that the delegates' mood was initially pretty glum but a Vajpayee pep-talk set things right somewhat. He said that though the party had lost, there was no reason for despair. The party had, after all, come second to the winning candidates in no fewer than 101 constituencies.

Perhaps. But the meetings of the various opposition parties showed that if there had been a groundswell against them in the Lok Sabha election, there was now a matching build-up of feeling against the ageing, traditional leadership of these parties. As the enormity of what had happened sank in, the rank and file of these opposition parties and the CPI(M) added their own voice to the clamour for change, shaking pedestals that have stood firm for decades. In office after office the younger elements, smarting from the defeat, spoke out in bitter defiance of their party elders at stock-taking sessions.

IN NEW DELHI, after the DMKP executive meeting, the young party leader from Haryana, K. M. Hooda, held centre-stage and began his address with a scathing indictment of "these old men". Karpoori Thakur, the dedicated stalwart from Bihar who was trounced in Samastipur, tried to quieten him but the crowd in attendance howled in approval. For 45 minutes—in a speech longer than his chief Charan Singh's—Hooda spat fire, demanding a change of guard, approach, outlook and strategy, in short, a wholesale change of the party's character.

If the DMKP was the scene of such loud protestation, the BJP was stirred by more subtle protest from its usually disciplined cadres. The party's top level leadership came in for veiled criticism from the younger elements in its national executive who made it clear that they were fed up with impractical notions such as politics by coalition. Younger leaders, led by Pramod Mahajan from Maharashtra, made a virulent attack on the tactics of seeking electoral adjustments with other opposition parties and demanded that the BJP carve out a separate, independent place of its own on the country's political map. The senior leadership was hard put to restrain them, and just about managed to persuade the protesters to accept tentative plans for state-level adjustments in the forthcoming assembly elections.

The Janata Party was simultaneously going through its own throes of introspection, though the spasms were somewhat quieter. As the Central Parliamentary Board met in Delhi, a low-key campaign was suddenly launched seeking to replace Chandra Shekhar as party president with a new face like Hegde's. Even though George Fernandes quickly rallied to Chandra Shekhar's support, asserting

Chandra Shekhar

On the Opposition debacle: The Opposition parties have been suffering from confusion. The Opposition is not one homogenous lot. There are many people in the Opposition whose political thinking is more in tune with the Congress(I). But this time it was due to our confusion that we were not able to counter the Congress(I)'s utterly false propaganda on Punjab, like the allegation that we supported the Anandpur Sahib Resolution. People wonder how I lost my own election on this very issue. I say Gandhi lost his life on this very issue. And who am I compared to Gandhi. Also, even when we tried to counter the propaganda we had our limitations. We had no control over the mass media to enable us to air our views freely and give them the right kind of prominence.

On the Hindu wave: Yes, there was a Hindu backlash. But we had all seen it coming. The result of this election was decided by Beant Singh and Satwant Singh. On the very day of the assassination I had told Bapu Kaldate (Janata Party secretary) that the election was lost. But there was no point going around announcing that, for the election had to be fought, anyway. But this will have dangerous consequences. Once you have unleashed communal feelings they could lead to the disintegration of the country. What is so sensational about the minorities talking in extreme terms? Even Annadurai did that(in Tamil Nadu) but was persuaded to be restrained.

On Opposition unity: Our failure to unite also contributed to the defeat. The Congress(I) went around saying that and it was hardly wrong. We, in the Opposition with our image of perpetual squabblers failed to convince people that we could guard the integrity of the nation. I was from the very beginning against the idea of promising a coalition government at the Centre. It is one thing to talk about such an arrangement at the state level but people are obviously not happy with the idea of a coalition in Delhi.

On future unity moves: Hegde is right when he says that empty talk about unity and pointless exercises will only have adverse effects on the Opposition. There should be unity but among like-minded people with common purpose. There is no way we can have fruitful unity except on the basis of issues, and that will result from clear thinking and not muddle-headedness, it is clear.

that there was neither any possibility nor any need for change in leadership, there was no mistaking the undercurrents.

Even the more tightly run CPI(M) was being buffeted by demands for change. More and more young Marxist workers, particularly in West Bengal (page 42) were accusing the old guard of having lost their "revolutionary spirit" and becoming outdated. The politburo took note of this and as its key members E.M.S. Namboodiripad and Harkrishen Singh Surjeet left for a short visit to Afghanistan, preparations were afoot for a party central committee meeting in Delhi on January 21 which promised to give voice to the aspirations of the younger rank and file.

The message was loud and clear, and the more realistic among the opposition leaders were already beginning to acknowledge it even if grudgingly. "There is no doubt now that we have to offer something fresh to the people, beginning with faces," said BJP President A.B. Vajpayee, still smarting from his Gwalior rout. This newfound desire seemed to cut across party lines. Congress(S) aspirant, Ambika Soni, who lost her deposit in Meerut, felt that the time for transformation has come because "only those opposition leaders who genuinely feel humiliated can bring about change."

While that sort of open-mindedness was still restricted to a few, at least some opposition leaders were finally coming to terms with the reality and moving away from stock allegations of rigging, muscle and money power. They were seeing a little more clearly just what kind of a tornado had swept them off the country's parliamentary map. Not surprisingly, the analysis tended to echo what the more perceptive observers had seen much earlier than the blinkered opposition ranks. There was, of course, the effectiveness of the Congress(I)'s strategy (INDIA TODAY, January 15) and the prime minister's aggressive campaigning which kept the opposition parties off balance, denying his allegations instead of picking holes in the ruling party's own performance, perceptions and promises. But there were other, more basic reasons. Among them:

▶ Mrs Gandhi's assassination had clearly pulled the rug from under the opposition's feet. Far from sharing any ideology or programme, the non-communist national opposition parties had built up their hopes—and their election appeal—on opposing Mrs Gandhi and her style of politics. When she was abruptly removed from the scene, so were the opposition's electoral chances. Admitted Chandra Shekhar, who was convincingly thrashed in Ballia: "The fate of the election was decided by Beant Singh and Satwant Singh. I knew it from the very beginning, but then there was no point talking about it. The election had to be fought anyway."

▶ The assassination had the unexpected effect of slicing sections of some opposition parties and pushing them towards the Congress(I). The BJP and other parties were undoubtedly affected in the Hindi belt by the reaction of Nanaji Deshmukh, a stalwart of the RSS, who in the first flush after the assassination issued a call to the people to support Rajiv Gandhi "in this hour of national crisis". On the other side of the political spectrum, CPI(M) Politburo member B.T Ranadive wrote an article in the party organ, People's Democracy, calling the event a "great national calamity" and asked cadres to rally round Rajiv Gandhi. In West Bengal, Chief Minister Jyoti Basu took this seriously enough to order that the paper was not circulated in the state, but the damage was done. It now appears that the CPI(M) would have taken a softer line towards the Congress(I) but for the insistence of the West Bengal unit.

▶ Deprived of a focal point after Mrs Gandhi's slaying, whatever hopes there may have been of opposition unity swiftly evaporated. Said the BJP's Ram Jethmalani, who was humbled in his North-West Bombay constituency: "The main reason for the Congress(I) victory (was) the splintered look of the Opposition. The lack of a uniform party, the failure to project a single agreed leader—we just could not remove the doubts in the voter's mind."

▶ The hope that the electorate would prefer a coalition of opposition parties to the Congress(I) proved to be an illusion. Not only was the memory of the Janata bickering of 1978 and 1979 fresh, there was little reason to doubt the prime minister when he pricked the opposition bubble, asking how could parties that couldn't agree on sharing tickets ever hope to agree on running a government. With the prime minister putting unity and national security at the top of his bill of fare, the electorate concurred that a potentially unstable coalition was no answer to the country's needs.

▶ Perhaps most significantly of all, the opposition parties seemed to be out of tune with the prevailing cry for change—a change of the political culture, a change of atmosphere, a change of generation. The Congress(I) came in waving the flag of youth power. The opposition parties were led by stalwarts in their sixties, seventies and even eighties. Even the most tenacious of them, Charan Singh, was obliged to admit: "I hope a younger leadership will soon take-over the responsibility of running the party." But there were few takers when he went on to add: "I would like to relinquish this (the leadership) at the earliest."

There could hardly be a rout more complete and more widespread across the opposition spectrum, a clean sweep which left only the Telugu Desam in Andhra Pradesh untouched. Yet there was a clamour in opposition ranks that their leaders weren't taking the right lessons. Karnataka Chief Minister R.K. Hegde expressed a widespread feeling when he said: "We don't seem to learn from our own experience. The Opposition should have a deep introspection on why it is incapable of learning any lessons." Lt-General (Retd) S.K. Sinha, the newest entrant to the non-political Hindustan Andolan and an unsuccessful contestant for the Patna Lok Sabha seat, put it more candidly: "If after such a decimation, the Opposition cannot wake up and change, what can we do? All we can say is, let it be decimated even more, then people will wake up."

The BJP, for instance, with its Hindu vote-base eroded, faced a vicious dilemma, whether to try and improve its secular image or beat a retreat in an attempt to retrieve the Hindu vote. On the grounds that the party had gained support from

On his rural base: In the states of Hayana, Rajasthan, Bihar and Uttar Pradesh our mass base has remained intact. Some other parties have lost considerably in these states and, obviously, their vote has gone over to the Congress(I) to our disadvantage. The voting figures are no secret. You don't get some 15 million votes in just four states and that too in only about 120 seats if your rural support is lost. The problem is in convincing people that the factors for getting next to no seats are to be sought elsewhere.

On his campaign: At least as far as the DMKP is concerned it probably suffered because its campaign was based on a positive platform. It did not play on caste or communal sentiments and did not confine itself to criticism of the Government. It might have secured better dividends if it had matched the Congress(I)'s negative campaign with an equally negative one by harping on the Bhindranwale connection and some of the other communal stances of the ruling party.

On Opposition unity: A patchwork unity, devoid of ethics and purpose, will not convince people. How a genuine unity of like-minded parties can be brought about is more than I can say. But in an election like this where sentiments clearly got the better of all else, it is difficult to say if anything could have made a great difference. I will not, however, entirely reject the possibility that a united opposition might have performed better.

On future plans: I do not agree that defeat in an election implies loss of prestige or even credibility. I do think that apart from regional parties DMKP is the only mass-based party with a definite philosophy. Its manifesto is the most radical, comprehensive and coherent. The agenda for the future is propagating this philosophy all over India more effectively.

On the new government: They have begun well and with humility. I wish them success and my party will cooperate in any serious effort to preserve and strengthen national unity. My only fear is that a person who constantly talks of taking the party into the 21st century may follow in the footsteps of his mother who followed a megalomaniacal policy based on elitist philosophies.

On the need for younger leaders: It is not the image but the reality which I value. We did have many young candidates, we will have many more. Besides, younger people should take over the party responsibility. However, I wish to add that youth is a state of mind. Gandhiji was 62 when he went on his Dandi march and 73 when he launched the Quit India movement.

the minorities—a claim that has yet to be proved—Vajpayee fought off the revivalists saying that the "Hindu vote will come back our way on its own."

The three-day meet also ended with a realisation that it would gain no popularity if it went through with its initial threat of filing 220 poll petitions, one for each seat that it lost, and at fortnight's end the party had beaten a tactical retreat, veering round to the view that a few petitions in carefully selected constituencies would make a point without reducing the whole thing to a joke.

The DMKP, on the other hand, appeared to persist in its endeavour to paint the Congress(I) success in terms of the three M's: money, muscle and manipulation, insisting that its power-base had remained intact. Said Charan Singh: "You don't get 15 million votes mainly from four states, and that too in only 120 constituencies, if your rural support base is lost." The DMKP does not believe that it suffered on account of an utterly negative campaign, arguing on the contrary that it should have been much more aggressive in identifying the Congress(I) with Bhindranwale as a counter to the ruling party's attacks on the Opposition.

The only silver lining was the determination of several parties to first concentrate on the morale of their rank and file before attempting to take on the Congress(I) again. With a challenge due in the March assembly polls, there is clearly an urgent need to retrieve lost morale. As Vajpayee said: "The problem first of all is inspiring our men into saying that they will be able to rule a state. At the moment, they are all too dazed, too dumbfounded to even make that claim." The problem is an urgent one, for the lone BJP member in the new Arunachal Assembly had decided to sit as an independent, and the DMKP's Nagina Rai, the unsuccessful candidate from Gopalganj, has defected to the Congress(I).

WHAT bedevils the Opposition's efforts is the absence of a credible long-term strategy. A patchwork of parties fighting their common political foe and one another cannot hope to make any headway. At the same time, there's little doubt that the well-publicised but hopelessly unsuccessful attempts at bringing about unity among the opposition parties has only rebounded on them. Says Hegde: "I have no faith in the kind of exercise being carried out to bring about opposition unity. The endless talks for unity have ruined our credibility." The parties have, therefore, decided that there will be no opposition conclaves. Andhra Chief Minister N.T. Rama Rao, the architect of the conclaves, himself sounded cautious when he told INDIA TODAY that he had no plans to bring about another conclave. "But a unified opposition is imperative," he added, saying: "I may talk to some leaders while I am in Delhi to attend the swearing-in ceremony of my party MP's." The opposition parties have not, however, reacted enthusiastically to his proposal to rename his party as Bharat Desam in the event of any mergers.

What strategy there is focuses on salvaging some lost prestige in the assembly elections which are important not only in themselves but because without success, there will follow a third failure when the time comes to elect Rajya Sabha members. The approach, as it was being worked out in closed door sessions, was at a practical level being reduced to seat adjustment at the state level, thereby leaving the final decision on allocations to the state units.

The concept was summed up by former MP Jaswant Singh who said: "The Congress(I) won at the national level because it offered a prime minister while we talked of coalitions. But the Congress(I)'s weakness is that they cannot offer popular, powerful leaders as chief ministers in most states." The argument was, of course, that the opposition parties could offer strong state leaders, men like Sharad Pawar in Maharashtra, Farooq

THE IDEA, basically, is that the Opposition would choose one dominant leader in each state as the prospective chief minister and let him spearhead the campaign. But even before the idea has got off the ground, there are indications of its limited practicality. Specifically, there is no denying that it will fail precisely where the Opposition most desperately needs to show success: in the Hindi heartland. In these crucial states, particularly Uttar Pradesh and Bihar, no opposition party is strong enough and no single leader dominant enough to command sufficient attention. It may be possible to come to working arrangements in some states. The national non-communist opposition parties may, for instance, find it possible to accept former chief ministers Bhairon Singh Shekhawat or Kailash Joshi as the man to rally round in Rajasthan, or find a leader from the BJP in Madhya Pradesh, which got some 30 per cent of the vote. In Orissa, nobody is likely to challenge Biju Patnaik, who has already announced his intention to resign from the Lok Sabha and contest the assembly poll. Similarly, in Maharashtra, the only opposition leader to survive the Congress(I) blitz respectably is Sharad Pawar who not only romped home in his Baramati constituency, but had the satisfaction of seeing his Congress(S) party's 13 candidates acquit themselves well even though none of them won. Pawar has the support of the Janata and the Peasants and Workers Party, but is not yet sure of the BJP which is allied to the Shiv Sena.

The strategy will, however, be put to its severest test in Karnataka where Hegde is on call to save his two-year-old regime. The Janata Party got some 44 per cent of the vote, but lost all but three of the seats it contested. The fly in the ointment is an old one: the reluctance of Janata Party workers to go along with the BJP. A secretary explained: "Many of our workers point out that in the constituencies left to the BJP, we got less votes than elsewhere. So they feel that if they'd fought the election alone, we'd have got more votes." But both Chandra Shekhar and Hegde have come out in favour of the alliance, not wishing to split votes at the poll.

But the fact remains that people like Pawar and Hegde may find they have more in common with the new-look Congress(I) than with the gerontocracy which continues to run the Opposition. Hegde has already raised eyebrows by openly saying that Rajiv Gandhi had won

On election results: We failed to gauge the tide that was building up. The assassination made things so different. A few days before she died, Mrs Gandhi was thinking of finding ways to postpone elections. This result would have been very different but for her death. The main lesson we have to learn now is that positive, issue-based campaigns can be more fruitful in situations like this. For example so far our whole approach has been centred round criticism of Mrs Gandhi. Once Mrs Gandhi disappeared from the scene, it all vanished. Rajiv Gandhi began with a clear slate. What did we have against him? Our campaign should have changed accordingly.

On RSS Loyalties: It is wrong to say that the RSS cadres deserted the BJP and went over to the Congress(I). Nothing can be farther from truth. But I am, at the same time, not denying that there was a strong Hindu backlash. This particularly affected women and lots of our workers say how women in their own families voted for the Congress(I). I went to Bengali Market (in Delhi) the other day and an old party worker asked me why we were making such a noise about the number of Sikhs killed in Delhi as it cost us votes. Now, that is a terrible situation. You can't even talk about massacre of your own countrymen.

On Opposition unity: I can say one thing for sure now. There will be no more conclaves. These repeated talks have made us the country's laughing stock. We meet again and again, have squabbles, the media writes about that and we lose credibility. I am, no doubt, for workable election arrangements among like-minded parties but unity is a rather far-fetched concept now. Look at the last election. In many states adjustments worked out earlier fell by the wayside over last minute wrangles over just one seat.

On the new government: Rajiv Gandhi is trying to project a youthful image. He is even contacting the opposition leaders asking for cooperation. The other day H.K.L. Bhagat came to my place with a message from the prime minister. But I asked him what was the point in talking now to people his prime minister has painted as traitors all through his election. Bhagat said the impression was created by inaccurate newspaper reports. Now what do you say about that?

On the future of his party: The election result gives us time for rethinking. There is need to project new faces. We have young talent in people like Pramod Mahajan of Bombay and Arun Jaitely of Delhi. Besides we have to make every attempt to strengthen our rural base and also make an effort to woo the Harijan vote. All I will say is, sitaron se aage jahan aur bhi hain (there are new worlds even beyond the stars).

a positive vote for unity and that had he not been a member of a political party, he too would "perhaps" have voted for the Congress(I). It would be far-fetched and manifestly unfair to draw any conclusions from this but it could be different if infighting and political obscurantism continue to rule the Opposition roost. And there has been enough speculation about Pawar for his supporters to feel obliged to deny that he might very soon get itchy feet.

But in the miasma of realpolitik, there is nothing absolute, no ever-lasting loyalty or party affiliation.The very factors that make men like Hegde and Pawar such obvious choices for the Opposition's future thrust also make them less than determined opponents of the Congress-(I)'s policies. In his first fortnight after the election, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi promptly turned his back on his election rhetoric and extended a friendly hand, seeking to pull them into a process of consultation on national issues. His messages to the opposition leaders despatched through Parliamentary Affairs Minister H.K.L. Bhagat were conciliatory. Then, he invited BJP General Secretary L.K. Advani, Congress(J)'s Jagjivan Ram and the CPI's Indrajit Gupta for informal discussions on Assam and Punjab.

IF THE prime minister was acknowledging the necessity of consulting opposition opinion in coming to decisions on national questions, it was a reflection of one side-effect of last month's election: the reduction of the parliamentary opposition to a pale reflection of its former self. Gone are the men and women of past parliaments who in their own way contributed to the functioning of parliament by bringing expertise and hard work to bear on the functioning of parliamentary committees, so essential to the running of a democracy. There may now be temptation for the Congress(I) to ignore the opposition benches altogether in the Lok Sabha. It will also be a house in which three localised parties, the yellow-clad Telugu Desam from Andhra Pradesh, the AIADMK from Tamil Nadu and the CPI(M) with representatives mainly from West Bengal and Tripura will form the bulk of the Opposition. It will be a novel experience for the country to have its affairs debated and policy discussed in such a one-sided house.

Even more than the absence of opposition as a political group, what Indian democracy will miss for the next five years is the liveliness of parliamentary debate which was sustained in the past by people like Jethmalani, Fernandes, Bahuguna and obviously, the inimitable Vajpayee—all committed parliamentarians who have maintained a notable presence in the Central Hall for decades. Even Rajiv

Gandhi seemed to regret missing out on the fun when he said that with the Opposition wiped out now, he will have to turn to people within his own party for an opposing point of view. In any case, for the new speaker this Parliament will not present any real challenge.

And one-sided it will remain until there is the sort of change in the Opposition ranks that has so recently in such tragic circumstances been forced upon the Congress(I). The difference is that the ruling party is hastening the change. The opposition parties seem to be making haste slowly. In their manner of functioning, nothing seems to have changed when in reality everything has changed. Where the Congress(I) finds the courage to get rid of deadwood or individuals it doesn't want in office any longer, the Opposition chews its nails in anguish. Where the Congress(I) proclaims that it has been through a generation change, the Opposition ranks are still dominated by men who have been active in politics for generations. This in itself isn't necessarily bad, but every party, every organisation needs the infusion of fresh blood. Few people have the courage to act upon it, though enough people now seem to recognise the imperatives. Says Jethmalani: "As a first step (towards unity) these three old men, Morarji Desai, Charan Singh and Jagjivan Ram must step down."

The second rung is full of men who even if they have lost the elections or just about managed to scrape through could form the basis of a coming together. Men like Hegde, Advani, Vajpayee, Fernandes, Abdullah, Pawar, Rama Rao, who could conceivably form the nucleus of a revived opposition and open the doors to younger politicians, activists with grassroots communication and an absence of the inflated egos that have been the bane of the Opposition's life.

For the Opposition, the message is clear: Change or Perish. Change that means not merely a different, fresher, more youthful leadership but a new approach, new promises, new goals, new programmes. Change there must be not only because a meaningful opposition is necessary for sound democracy and the smooth running of the country, but because by their vote in December, about half the country's electorate showed that in spite of the Rajiv whirlwind, they were for somebody else. The tragedy is that the massacre of the Opposition at the polls has produced no great impulse as yet. And if this doesn't spark a new opposition, then there is little else that will.

—SHEKHAR GUPTA with bureau reports

RAGHAVENDRA RAO

Ramakrishna Hegde

On what should be done: We do not seem to have learnt lessons. The Opposition should have a deep introspection on why we are incapable of learning. We must quickly recover from the shock of defeat and demoralisation. Also we must realise that our present government and the prime minister are different from the previous ones. Earlier our target was Mrs Gandhi. She represented everything in the Congress(I), its ideology, programme and government. But Rajiv has shown through his doctrine the beginnings of a new policy. Our attitude has to change.

On new strategy: Firstly, we have to wait and watch. Whether he would be like his mother who we knew too well or be different. He seems to have an indication of a break from the past. So far Rajiv Gandhi has been making the right moves, playing his cards well and is showing a refreshing departure from the past. But we have to see whether he will continue to behave in the same vein.

On Opposition unity: I do not see any point in going on with unity exercises. We have tried to unify in every possible way but it has not been possible. All unity has floundered on personal prejudices or ambition and not on the question of ideological differences. These prejudices are so deep-rooted and strong and permeate every opposition party in the country that even if there is cent per cent agreement on policies, ideologies and programmes, there will not be unity.

I am sorry to say that at times the fight was for such ridiculous things as to who should sit where on the dais or who should be garlanded first. The obsession with unity seems to be only to give each other greater bargaining power. We must get ourselves free from this obsession and identify issues.

Hereafter we should work the other way round. That is we should see whether it is possible to bring about unity on the basis of personal likings and rapport and on the basis of compatibility of personalities. For example there is no clash between Vajpayee, Sharad Pawar, Chandra Shekhar, Rama Rao and Farooq. There is no basic difference in our ideology. We all believe in secularism, democracy and socialism.

On his own ideology: We need radical change on all fronts including our thinking. We must not be pinned down by dogmas. Opposition is vital to parliamentary democracy. It also acts as a forum of dissent.

On the Opposition's future: Well, the prime ministership is out of sight for the opposition leaders. I am sorry to throw cold water on their ambitions but the present generation of opposition leaders had better come to the painful realisation that they will never get the prime ministership in their sight.

WEST BENGAL

Warning Signals

"If today everywhere in the world the parties who claim to represent the 'Moderate Left' are beaten or in retreat, it is because they were found wanting on the most crucial issue of our time."
ARTHUR KOESTLER
in The Trail of the Dinosaur.

WARNING signals for West Bengal's Left Front Government had been flashing on and off during the past couple of years but were dismissed as "aberrations". On the surface the state had remained deceptively calm. The turmoil beneath came to a boil only when the results of the Lok Sabha polls started coming. By the time the loudspeakers finally fell silent on new year's eve, it was evident that a soundless anti-Left gale had swept through the entire state, with the eye of the hurricane in metropolitan Calcutta.

The Congress(I)'s success in winning 16 out of 42 West Bengal seats compared to just four last time is only a part of the story. So is the decline in the electoral margin of Left Front victors. Today, the state is in the grip of a cynicism about the Left movement, a fact admitted even by left-wingers who voted for the Front. As film maker Gautam Ghoshe points out, "the Left is not what it used to be, it has degenerated into something undefinable."

The disenchantment is most pronounced in the state's urban areas. "It is a change in culture, in the way people, especially the young, look at life," observed well-known Bengali novelist, Nabanita Deb Sen.

Map by B.K. SHARMA

While Chief Minister Jyoti Basu, in an interview with INDIA TODAY, admitted that the Front's poll reverses were due to its failure to meet the expectations of some sections of the people, the official party line initially was not quite so contrite. Just four days before the polls, Left Front Chairman Saroj Mukherjee had presumptuously declared that the Front was running the Government in accordance with the aspirations of the common people. That there was something drastically wrong in this assumption he did not care to admit even after the polls. Mukherjee continued to claim that the results of the polls were "perplexing" and that a "detailed investigation" was required to find out what went wrong and ascertain the exact causes.

It was only a good 10 days after the declaration of the poll reverses that a joint meeting of all Left Front party leaders forced Mukherjee to admit that "non-performance" of the Left Front was one of the reasons for its debacle. The stress, however, remained on the sympathy wave that favoured the Congress(I). Leaders of the smaller Front parties, particularly the Forward Bloc and Revolutionary Socialist Party (RSP), had been insisting right from the day the poll results were announced that the CPI(M)'s analysis was wrong. They had maintained that "the voting trend in this election here is certainly anti-Left and we do not see any Indira or Rajiv wave". For the

"We have got a jolt"

WEST Bengal's Chief Minister Jyoti Basu is very much a disciplined partyman but he has a mind of his own. When Correspondent INDRANIL BANERJIE talked to him last fortnight, Basu spoke of his party's recent poll reverses with surprising candour. Excerpts from the interview:

Q. Your party had dismissed the idea of a "sympathy wave" before the elections but after the poll reverses your party changed its mind. Why?

A. In the past, voters in this state had not been swayed by emotional issues and we presumed this time the "sympathy wave" would stop at the West Bengal border. But we were mistaken. There has been a tremendous revulsion against the brutal killing of Mrs Gandhi and she has become a martyr. Our criticism of Mrs Gandhi's regime no longer had any meaning. Unity and integrity of the country became most important to the people, particularly in the absence of opposition unity.

Q. Has the Left Front failed to meet the aspirations of the people in the urban, industrial areas of the state?

A. I have a feeling that in the urban areas our non-performance, or the fact that here we really could not do much compared to what we did in the countryside, had an impact. Besides, our cadres in these areas were not really in intimate touch with the people. We could have saved a little more in the urban areas if the people were more satisfied with us but they were not. In that sense it was a first time in over two decades, the parties seem to have realised the pendulum is swinging away from the Left.

In 1967, when the Left first came to power, West Bengal's colleges and universities reverberated with the singing of "We Shall Overcome", "The International" and slogans proclaiming the dawn of a left paradise. Thousands of young men and women signed up with the Naxalbari-inspired Communist Party of India (Marxist-Leninist), a Maoist breakaway from the older CPI(M). Formed in the summer of '69, within just two years the party was destroyed and its members slaughtered. The next chance for the Left came in 1977 with the ouster of the Siddhartha Shankar Ray regime which had come to office in 1972.

But things had begun to go sour for the Congress long before. "The rejection of the Congress in West Bengal had started much earlier in the '60s," says M.A. Latif, People's Union for Civil Liberties (PUCL) secretary and civil liberties lawyer. He alleges that the Congress came to power in 1972, following a period of President's rule, using strong-arm tactics and had made it impossible for men like CPI(M) peasant leader Harekrishna Konar to file his nomination. When the Congress was defeated in 1977, it was a chastened Left that replaced it.

"The return of the Left Front was like a breath of fresh air, bringing tremendous expectations," says Nabanita Deb Sen. For the first time the moderate Left had been given a chance to rule the state unhindered. But right from the word go the Left Front exhibited a curious unease at being in power and developed a "paranoia" about the Centre and Mrs Gandhi.

Q. Thousands of unemployed young people in the urban areas have expectations of getting jobs and somehow the Congress(I) has been able to exploit this successfully. Would you agree?

A. Absolutely. It seems about 36 lakh new voters have come into the electoral rolls. Now, these young voters have no experience of the Congress party and what it has done for 28 years. The unemployment situation has gone from bad to worse while we have not been able to explain to them, it is not our fault that all this has happened. Our explanation that wrong planning, denial of investment opportunity in this state and the bias of financial institutions against us did not convince the young.

Q. Can your party solve the unemployment problem?

A. Unemployment cannot be solved by us. Planning is in the hands of the Centre. We have to go on campaigning among the people so as to put terrific pressure on the Centre for more investment and industrial licences. Only in the case of small-scale industry we can do much more. But raising expectations unrealistically will only lead to disillusionment. This time Ghani Khan's ridiculous tactics of distributing railway employment forms drew large numbers of young people. But they are soon going to get disillusioned with the Congress. One of the original promises of the Congress(I), to give a job to one member from every family completely failed.

Q. Why do you think your party cadres have become arrogant and lost contact with the people?

A. We are a ruling party and any party coming into government faces this danger. Besides, our party has grown tremendously during the past few years and we have not been able to re-educate the party. We must be more and more humble since we are in the Government and I must admit, unfortunately, that we have failed in this respect. But now that we have got a jolt in the elections we shall take up the job of re-education of our cadres on a priority basis. From the reports we have been receiving it seems a small section of the party has been behaving and speaking arrogantly. Such things give our party a bad name. But we will identify them and take action.

Q. There is a feeling that after you there is no effective leader in the CPI(M). To what extent is this true?

A. Nature abhors a vacuum. People thought what will happen after Lenin but something did happen. Similarly with Nehru. Parties continue. But I believe individuals do have a role to play. Our party will continue and I am not, as some papers make it out to be, the party. The party will remain. All the same, a conscious effort must be made to ensure that a new leadership grows.

Successive CPI(M) resolutions identified the "authoritarian challenge" as the most immediate and crucial issue of the time. The suggestion that the Left Front should have made "an all-out effort to raise the state's populace from the mires of a subhuman existence by creating prosperity" was accorded secondary importance, points out former bureaucrat and demographer, Dr Ashok Mitra.

When it came to the crunch, the anti-authoritarian crusades of the Left Front did not inspire the state's populace, especially those unemployed thousands inhabiting the choked slums of metropolitan Calcutta. The stunning defeat of CPI(M) stalwart, Somnath Chatterjee, in Jadavpur, a refugee-dominated constituency in southern metropolitan Calcutta, is an example. Considered to be a red bastion that had witnessed some of the worst excesses of "authoritarianism" during the early '70s Jadavpur elected Congress(I)'s 27-year-old lightweight Mamta Banerjee because "all of a sudden she and her party had become more relevant than the arrogant Marxist lawyer Chatterjee", says schoolteacher J.N. Mullick.

THE DECISIVE factors in Jadavpur were the youth, who in the words of novelist Deb Sen, "are more interested in the good things of life and not in social or political questions." Young Congress(I) leaders, like Subrata Mukherjee and Priya Ranjan Das Munshi, are the heroes of this generation. The identification of the Left Front as the establishment and the creation of a vast lumpen force has seen to it. In the circumstances it is easy to see how Das Munshi managed to inflict a crushing defeat on CPI(M) politburo member, Samar Mukherjee, in Howrah. This basic shift in attitudes is not acknowledged by the CPI(M) leadership. "The so-called theory of anti-establishment is not applicable here since ours is a government of the masses," the Left Front chairman had declared before the elections. Admitting that a section of youths had strayed to the Congress(I), he had moralised: "Any young man with a

Mellow Stance

THE SPARK from Naxalbari that set West Bengal ablaze during the late '60s is dead. Though a few isolated former Naxalites continue to bump off the occasional "class enemy" in the backwoods of the state, the majority of them have ended up in an ideological cul-de-sac. Perhaps as a reaction, a number of former Naxalite factions have begun to flirt with parliamentary democracy, the very system they so violently opposed only a decade and a half ago.

"The objective situation in the country favours the use of parliamentary forms to accelerate mass movements," argues Arijit Mitra, secretary of the north-eastern zone of the Indian People's Front (IPF), the mass front of the Naxalite faction led by Vinod Misra. The IPF supported Lok Sabha candidates this time not only in West Bengal but also in Andhra Pradesh and Bihar. In West Bengal, a prominent candidate it supported was Tridib Chaudhri of the Revolutionary Socialist Party, who lost to the Congress(I). A radical group led by the famed Kanu Sanyal fielded two candidates, both of whom lost their deposits. Candidates fielded by other Naxalite factions did just as badly.

The radicals consider these rebuffs to be of little significance. The idea of contesting the elections, all of them take pains to point out, was not to win but to use the opportunity to campaign among the masses. "We did not put up any candidates of our own but supported candidates who we felt were capable of furthering our aim of containing the onslaught posed by the Congress(I)," says Mitra. This should have benefitted the Left Front, especially the CPI(M). But almost every Naxalite faction, with the possible exception of Ashim Chatterjee's group considers the CPI(M) to be a party of "fake leftists".

Arijit Mitra: significant shift

That is one reason the radical left in the state has not vanished. Many sections within moderate left parties like the CPI(M) have begun to gravitate towards more radical organisations out of frustration. "Our leaders have forgotten revolution in their concern to remain in power," says 21-year-old Pradip Mazumdar, a member of the CPI(M)'s youth wing, the Students' Federation of India. But more significant is desertion from the ranks of the CPI(M)'s district-level leadership which, according to the state's intelligence branch, is one reason for the party's poor showing at the hustings. In Murshidabad district, for instance, three CPI(M) leaders along with 16 local committees walked out of the party last year to form the Marxbadi Sangathani Committee, which has now decided to join the IPF.

Even professional groups disillusioned with the Left Front who would be expected to cross over to the Congress(I) are drifting towards the radical left instead. Two former leaders of the junior doctors' agitation that was brutally suppressed by the Jyoti Basu Government have thrown in their lot with the radicals. Of all the Naxalite factions, the IPF appears to have been the most successful in tapping these left reserves. This has helped it build bridges even with an organisation like the Federation of Government Engineers Associations.

The most desperate need for the radicals remains unity, and in a bid to forge it they have had to fall back on time-worn programmes like anti-eviction and higher agricultural wage movements. And they joined together to fight the Government's decision to raise bus fares. The idea seems to be to utilise whatever opportunity is available to voice their propaganda and secure footholds among the masses.

But despite their ideology most of the radical left groups have become moderate. Their only essential difference with the CPI(M) lies in their belief that potentially revolutionary mass movements, instead of being contained, should be accelerated. "The CPI(M) has made the masses inactive and created conditions for the return of autocracy," says a former CPI(ML) activist. Most of the radicals realise that for the moment, at least, revolution is a distant dream.

sense of self-respect should have no truck with that party."

But self-respect is not the issue at all. Left Front leaders have unabashedly admitted they cannot solve the unemployment problem. On the other hand, as CPI(M) economist, Biplab Das Gupta, points out: "Ghani Khan's promise to employ Bengali boys had a tremendous psychological impact on youthful voters." Clearly, the shrewd former railway minister had understood the urban masses better than most leftists. To lend credibility to his promise Ghani Khan had recruited several hundred young men to check ticketless travel.

Being in power seems to have handicapped the CPI(M) since this has meant reneging on rash promises made in the past. Jadavpur resident Gautam Chakraborty, explaining his support for the Congress(I), says: "The CPI(M) had promised us the ownership rights for the land under our occupation but eventually agreed only to make us lessees." Similarly neither could the party go the whole hog in its support of labour. In its anxiety to restrain labour militancy, the Left Front had dealt a grievous blow to the CPI(M) labour movement, represented by the Centre of Indian Trade Unions (CITU).

ALTHOUGH CITU leaders continue to maintain that there has been no decline in the membership of their unions, the Congress(I)-backed Indian National Trade Union Congress's (INTUC) impressive tally of recent wins in union elections indicates otherwise. "The CITU's official membership figures are misleading and its real strength in a particular unit can only be found out from shop level leaders," says Surendra Chatterjee, secretary of the left wing workers' solidarity organisation. In the Durgapur steel plant, Chatterjee's investigations revealed that the CITU's membership had slumped from 16,000 (out of a total work-force of 34,000) two years ago to barely 5,000 at present.

It is not merely a general alarm at the declining industrial employment opportunities and the labour retrenchments necessitated by power cuts that have rendered the CITU and the Left Front unpopular with labour. Misgivings on other counts include the state Government's tolerant stance towards some industries' refusal to honour labour-management agreements. Moreover, a large section of non-Bengali workers scheduled to retire within the next few years have become distrustful of the Bengali leader-dominated CITU. The INTUC has successfully exploited the issue of granting jobs on a hereditary basis, while a few Left Front leaders have opposed such "feudal practices". Not unnaturally, the Left Front has suffered humiliating defeats in every industrial constituency in the state.

"By introducing partisan politics in every administrative level, the CPI(M) has brought corrupt practices to the doorstep of every villager."

M.A. LATIF,
PUCL secretary

Economist Bhabatosh Dutta who has headed a number of government commissions traces the roots of these reverses to the Left Front's failure to revive the state's moribund economy. "To be fair, the problems of Bengal are so complex that any government in power for a long time is bound to run into trouble," feels Dutta, who nevertheless admits that the Government, by managing its finances better, could have allocated more funds for creating productive assets. Referring to the unemployment dole, which has already cost the state exchequer about Rs 100 crore, as an example of unwarranted expenditure, he contends that the ample additional resources mobilised by the state Government "ought to have been used wholly for financing plans". Insufficient investment in the state's power and irrigation sectors perpetuated the economic stagnation that began in the late 1950s.

Where the Left Front has had a modicum of success is in the agrarian sector. The anti-left gale that toppled every urban bastion only shook the left's rural forts. Of the six purely rural Lok Sabha constituencies won by the Congress(I)—Malda, Behrampore, Raiganj, Contai, Barasat and Mathurapur—two are traditional Congress(I) strongholds, while Contai has always been a marginal seat for the left. "The fact that we retained most rural seats despite a pro-Congress swing," says senior CPI(M) minister Benoy Krishna Choudhury, "is proof that the rural masses by and large are still with the left."

Currently, however, most of the Left Front's immensely successful agrarian programmes like Operation Barga, land redistribution and the agricultural wage movements, have come to a total standstill. While Benoy Choudhury and other CPI(M) leaders blame this on meddlesome courts and the Centre's refusal to assent to their Land Reforms Act amendment, old bureaucrats like Ashok Mitra contend that the real malady lies with the present leadership of the Left Front. One of the key men behind the present land reforms programme, Debabrata Bandyopadhyay, a bureaucrat who had helped the CPI(M) kisan leader Harekrishna Konar prepare the original land distribution programme way back in 1969, "was hounded out of the state Government by the CPI(M) for his excessive zeal," says Mitra, whose knowledge of the state bureaucracy is phenomenal.

Mitra feels that it was Konar's record that is responsible for the Left Front's foundations in rural Bengal. Konar believed in action and once when confronted by the law, had ordered CPI(M) cadres to forcibly occupy vested land. Today the Left Front has no one like him. After touring various parts of Bengal and participating in panchayat training camps, Mitra found CPI(M) cadres admitting that sharecroppers still got only 40 per cent share of the produce as against the legal 70 per cent. "When I pointed this out to Benoy Choudhury and others, they feigned ignorance," says Mitra.

The possibility that rural Bengal will one day go the way the urban centres have gone may be remote, but PUCL's Latif feels the danger signals have already started flashing. "By introducing partisan politics in every administrative level, the CPI(M) has brought corrupt practices to the doorstep of every villager," says Latif. He argues that if the Left Front fails to keep pumping money into the villages, the rural vote may well swing against it for "the moderate left has proved to be as corrupt and arrogant as the Congress was reputed to be".

Can pollution prevention pay for itself?

Incineration does it.

As compared to conventional pollution control methods, incineration in many cases, offers the added advantage of energy and by-product recovery which goes to pay back your initial investment within the first few years of operation.

For example —

Steam generation from heavy and light end tars in phenol manufacturing; solid and semi solid tars from rubber chemicals; heavy tank bottom sludge from refineries.

Caustic and steam from organic residues and mother liquors of a caprolactum plant; hydrochloric acid and steam from chlorinated organic residues of VCM and similar manufacturing operations; cobalt oxides and steam from DMT manufacturing units; caustic and steam from black liquor; steam and potash from spentwash ashes.

In collaboration with Ghelfi AG, Switzerland, Thermax has developed for the first time in India, incineration systems comprising vertical static and rotary kiln incinerators with multifuel burners and air pollution control equipment. This combination assures total destruction of organic and toxic wastes in liquid, solid and gaseous forms emanating from petrochemicals, fertilizers, refineries, organic chemicals, agrochemicals, pharmaceuticals, distilleries, paper, explosives and many others.

With incineration, Thermax not only provides the most effective answer to the question of industrial pollution, but also offers in many cases by-product recovery and a captive renewable source of energy, no conventional method can.

So if you have waste to dispose, let Thermax incinerate it.

Does your child have dry eyes with patches of grey bubbles ? Is she not able to see well at night ? If so, your child could be suffering from Vitamin-A deficiency. And Vitamin-A deficiency can lead to blindness.

Protect your child from Vitamin-A deficiency. Begin breast-feeding as soon as possible after birth and continue up to two years. After 4 to 6 months, give foods rich in Vitamin A, like dark green leafy vegetables, drumstick leaves, carrots and yellow or orange coloured fruits like papaya. If these are not available, give your child Vitamin-A capsules or drops. Ask your health worker for these.

Despite these, if the symptoms remain, contact a doctor or the nearest government health centre as soon as you can.

Remember, thousands of children go blind because of Vitamin-A deficiency every year. Don't let this happen to your child.

For a free booklet on the prevention of blindness in children, write to the following address indicating the language of your choice : Voluntary Health Association of India, C-14, Community Centre, Safdarjung Development Area, New Delhi 110 016.

TAMIL NADU

A Vexing Vacuum

SUCCESS breeds its own problems, as the AIADMK in Tamil Nadu is rapidly discovering. The party's current problems in Tamil Nadu have arisen precisely out of its resounding success in the assembly elections in which it had won 133 of the 234 assembly seats, enabling it to once again form a government on its own. This in spite of the fact that it contested the elections in alliance with the Congress(I) and conceded as many as 72 seats to that party in electoral adjustments, itself contesting only 162 seats.

But last fortnight, nearly three weeks after its election victory and a full two weeks after M.G. Ramachandran was formally elected legislature party leader again, the AIADMK was in an unenviable position, with its leader convalescing in New York from speech impairment and paralysis after a kidney transplant and unable to take the oath of office and take charge. In the words of Tamil Nadu Governor S.L. Khurana: "It is an unprecedented and ticklish situation."

While the new Assembly has been constituted on December 28 according to AIADMK ministers, the earliest that MGR is likely to return to Madras from New York is January-end or early February. And that means a minimum delay of more than a month. Also by a letter dated December 28, handed in by Finance Minister V.R. Nedunchezhiyan to the governor on December 31, MGR had submitted the resignation of his earlier council of ministers. A caretaker government has been in charge since. But more than the possible delay in MGR's return, it is the uncertainty about the actual condition of the chief minister's health that has given rise to the plaguing feeling of a constitutional vacuum in the state.

In the eagerness with which AIADMK partymen and doctors compete with each other to paint rosy pictures of MGR's health, they contradict one another and sometimes even themselves. For instance, neurologist Dr Eli Friedman of the Downstate Medical Centre in Brooklyn, where MGR is convalescing, had told The Hindu on the eve of the elections that it would be six months to a year before MGR regained his speech. But now he sets a nearer deadline, predicting "the chief minister will be able to speak in a few days". Dr P. Narendran, neurosurgeon at the Government General Hospital in Madras, who also met MGR last fortnight, goes one step further when he says: "Mr Ramachandran is able to walk by himself and also write legibly with his right hand. His comprehension is excellent. And he is able to speak well."

Governor S.L. Khurana was plainly suggesting that MGR should for the time being appoint some other party leader as chief minister. But that precisely is the insoluble problem for the AIADMK.

What was just flexing the right hand for Nedunchezhiyan became writing legibly for Narendran. And uttering a few words became speaking well. If these inconsistencies weren't enough, there were the earlier photographs of MGR reading the newspapers in his Brooklyn hospital bed and the clarification at the same time that the chief minister had not yet been informed of Mrs Gandhi's assassination. As DMK President M. Karunanidhi rightly asks: "If the chief minister is reading the papers and is able to comprehend, how is it that he has not yet realised that Mrs Gandhi has disappeared from the scene?"

Governor S.L. Khurana has also thrown in an indirect spanner into the AIADMK's works. In a letter to the AIADMK General Secretary P.U. Shanmugam written on January 1, after the party again elected MGR as leader on the previous day, the governor has stated that the swearing-in again of MGR as chief minister "will have to be when he is in a position to do so". That was the catch. The governor did not say that the swearing-in would be when MGR returned to Madras, but when he was in a position to take the oath of office. Khurana didn't stop there. He went on to say in the letter: "It will be advisable to limit the duration of the present caretaker government to as brief a span as possible so that the massive mandate of the people could find articulation in the early formulation and implementation of the progressive policies of the new government."

The governor's new year gift of a letter to Shanmugam placed the AIADMK in a position between the devil and the deep sea. On the one hand it seemed to suggest that MGR's swearing-in could not be before he was mentally and physically fit to assume office. On the other hand, the governor wanted AIADMK to form a new government as soon as possible, so that the caretaker government could be wound up at the earliest. The letter made the point that "a caretaker government can only transact routine business," and "as it is, the Government has been affected by the chief minister's absence from active duty from October."

Khurana made the point more explicit and specific in the formal letter he had to write to MGR, as leader of the majority party, inviting him to form the Government. The letter, which was sent through Nedunchezhiyan, said: "My congratulations on your electoral triumph. Nothing will give me greater pleasure now than to swear you in, if it is possible to do so immediately. But in case your recuperation, based on medical advice, indicates a longer convalescence, then you may, as leader, nominate someone to whom the oath of office could be administered. Such a person can advise the governor on the composition of the new council of ministers and he can step down when you are in a position to take over."

Khurana was, therefore, plainly suggesting that MGR should, for the time being, appoint some other party leader as chief minister. But that precisely is the insoluble problem for the AIADMK now. If partymen can be convinced that MGR is consciously agreeing to the governor's suggestion and is himself choosing a temporary leader, then it is possible they will gulp down their beloved leader's choice. But if they get the slightest doubt that some other party functionary has taken the law into his own hands and is acting on MGR's name, then rabid factionalism will come into the open.

THERE are three main rival factions in the party, all at each other's throats. One is led by the tough Information Minister R.M. Veerappan, MGR's aide for many decades, with people like Industries Minister C. Ponnaiyan, Agriculture Minister K. Kalimithu, and All-World MGR Fans Association President P. Musiriputhan. The second group is led by the former actress and deputy leader of the AIADMK in Parliament, Jayalalitha Jayaram, the influential Commercial Taxes Minister, S. Thirunavukarasu, Education Minister C. Aranganayakam, and Electricity Minister S. Ramachandran. This group is close to the Congress(I), and it is even said that it was at the invitation of Rajiv Gandhi that an ostracised and sulking Jayalalitha agreed to campaign for the elections.

Finally there are the AIADMK party heavyweights whom MGR kept out of government during his second term despite their hopes of induction into the cabinet being repeatedly expressed. There are men like party General Secretary Shanmugam, Treasurer S. Madhavan, and the speaker of the dissolved Assembly K. Rajaram. These people form the third faction. And finally there are ministers who are respectably neutral like Finance Minister V.R. Nedunchezhiyan and Health Minister H.V. Hande.

The faction fighting has become bitter. There were objections to Nedunchezhiyan's proposed visit to New York until a telex from the Indian consul general there on behalf of MGR indicated that the ailing leader wanted no one else to come. Party quarrels have erupted in public too: on January 4, when Nedunchezhiyan was leaving for the US, there was an airport altercation between Veerappan and Thirunavukarasu, and a few days later Veerappan was in top form publicly taunting Jayalalitha at the 34th birthday celebrations of film director and MGR's cinematic heir K. Bhagyaraj. Since then, the factions have been counting heads in the legislative party. Musiriputhan claims "over 120" of the 133. Thirunavukarasu on the other hand says 70 are with his faction.

(From top) Nedunchezhiyan Veerappan, Jayalalitha, Rajaram: rival claimants to the throne

The Congress(I) will not capitalise on the factional quarrels within the AIADMK. Informed political observers also concur that because of the bad taste that the Bhaskara Rao chapter left, the Congress(I) would not like to queer the political pitch for itself in the assembly elections due in eight states in March by inducing defections and forming the government in Tamil Nadu. So the divided AIADMK house does not face any danger yet. Even otherwise indications are that party leaders do not want to add any more fuel to the factional fires.

Says Veerappan now, anxious not to set the dovecotes aflutter any further: "We don't think there is any need to elect any interim chief minister. The chief minister will be returning latest by the first week of February and will take the oath of office." Disclosed Nedunchezhiyan in New York, "Even if the chief minister has to relax and convalesce for some more time after returning to Madras, he may take the oath but not take on any portfolio." And adds Khurana consolingly, "according to the eminent Nani Palkhivala whose opinion the AIADMK party has obtained, the chief minister need not even orally take the oath of affirmation. He can do so even by visual representation, that is even by nodding assent to the oath." Which all brings the swearing-in of MGR in the near future closer to reality.

The governor also doesn't rule out his going to Brooklyn to administer the oath of office to MGR, if it becomes inevitable. Explains he, "I don't want to do anything which will have repercussions outside the boundaries of our state. But if my going to New York is the only way out, I may do it." It is sobering that Tamil Nadu's political future still hinges on the health of just one person convalescing in far away Brooklyn.

Spiralling commercial rents. Acute shortage of good office space. Inability to plan for future expansion. The result — scattered offices all over the city. PUNJAB

Changing Attitudes

THE PRE-ELECTION rhetoric had been far from assuring. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi made Punjab and the controversial Anandpur Sahib resolution the centre-piece of his onslaught against the Opposition, so it was with considerable relief that Punjab—and particularly the Akali Dal—greeted his bridge-building post-victory national broadcast. The campaigner had been all fire and brimstone; the country's first leader was assuring the country that the lives and property of Sikhs would be protected, and a cabinet committee speedily would go into the Punjab problem thoroughly.

Rajiv's initiatives, most hopefully of all, seem to have prompted the Akalis to change their attitude as well. Realism dictated that a government with a 401 seat plurality in Parliament would be a very different negotiating adversary from the previous one that seemed to be on the skids, and Akali statements made it clear that they welcomed the prime minister's initiatives. "All our demands are within the framework of the Constitution, and this includes the Anandpur Sahib resolution and are certainly negotiable," said Akali leader Major Singh Uboke. Akali ad hoc convenor Surjan Singh Thekedar, however, wanted direct talks with the prime minister, as he had little faith in the cabinet committee.

Thekedar and many other Akalis also welcomed the prime minister's suggestion that the Akalis take the Anandpur Sahib resolution to the Sarkaria Commission—a suggestion first made, ironically enough, by the opposition parties. And for the elderly Akali leader and former minister, Jivan Singh Umramangal, a man who had never compromised with Bhindranwale, the Punjab problem could be solved quite easily provided the Government was honest. "It will not take five minutes for the problem to be solved. Chandigarh should be given to Punjab and Haryana adequately compensated. The river waters issue should be referred to the Supreme Court, a commission of experts should go into the disputed areas," he said, adding Punjab would be a litmus test for the political system.

But quite understandably, the Akalis had certain conditions. Most of their leaders were still in jail, as were many of their rank and file—at least 450 had been arrested under the National Security Act. There were special courts functioning in the state, the army was patrolling its 1,250 villages and 150 towns and Sikhs outside the state still felt threatened. Many of their conditions, such as release of the detained Akalis, could reasonably be accepted and meaningful discussions started. Delay could cause more migration of Sikhs to Punjab and infiltration from across the border by extremists who fled in the wake of Operation Bluestar.

Realism dictated that a government with a 401 seat plurality in Parliament would be a very different negotiating adversary from the previous one that seemed to be on the skids, and Akali statements made it clear that they welcomed the Prime Minister's initiative.

Thekedar: direct approach

SATPAL DANISH

Thus it seems there could be no better time than now to come to grips with the situation. Punjab Congress(I) President R.L. Bhatia met as many of the Akalis as he could, including the five high priests. He had been instrumental in preventing a violent showdown between the priests and Nihang chief Santa Singh within the temple precincts on Diwali day. He and former foreign minister Swaran Singh had last fortnight established discreet contact with the Akali leadership.

And attitudes were definitely softening. Despite Haryana Chief Minister Bhajan Lal's public stand that Chandigarh should be given to Punjab only when Abohar and Fazilka are given to Haryana in return, official sources indicate that Haryana is prepared to accept a reasonable and just solution. Adequate compensation for Chandigarh in the form of land and funds could be one way out. Similarly, on the river waters issue, a court verdict would be welcomed. Surveys are already being carried out in both states to mark areas suitable for an exchange, and the administrative machinery is set to implement any decision.

Most encouraging perhaps is the fact that many Sikhs who were dismayed by the massive swing in favour of the Congress(I) are now greatly relieved. A Congress(I) victory had looked to be a harbinger of sad days for the Sikhs—not only for the 35 lakh of them outside Punjab but the majority who inhabit this prosperous agricultural state. The failure of the administration to control the violence that took hundreds of lives in 10 Congress(I)-ruled states was seen as part of the Congress(I) game, and Rajiv Gandhi's election speeches and, most importantly, the one in Delhi where he had said that "the earth shakes when a big tree falls," were seen as bad omens.

But doubts still linger. In Punjab's towns and cities, where Sikhs are mostly in business, the feeling that another farcical play is on in Delhi is very strong. "There have been committees and meetings for two years and each time when it looked like some decision was around the corner, we went through another holocaust," says Gurdev Singh, a cloth merchant in Ludhiana. This feeling is shared by Sikh doctors, teachers and government servants. Some take it as another gimmick launched by Rajiv with an eye to the assembly polls in March. S.S. Sud, a senior lawyer in

Jalandhar, saw a contradiction in the Government pronouncing its serious desire for settlement and yet arresting so many under the National Security Act.

More encouraging were the attitudes of some rural Sikhs who spoke with INDIA TODAY and indicated that they were prepared to give time to Rajiv to try and bring about a solution. These articulate farmers want certain conditions fulfilled before talks begin: the Government must hold a judicial probe into the post-assassination killing of Sikhs and punish the guilty. There is also resentment that a large number of young men apprehended during and after Operation Bluestar have not been tried or properly investigated so that they can be charged or freed. "What matters is the intention behind these moves. Rajiv must stop playing with fire and settle the Punjab problem once and for all. After his victory he certainly looks more stable and his assurance on TV has helped to kindle confidence among Sikhs," says Satwant Kaur, a teacher.

Sikhs are also worried by the migration into Punjab. While businessmen and industrialists feel threatened by new competitors, others feel a refugee influx might complete the already sharp divide between Hindus and Sikhs. In this context the Government's efforts to provide security and confidence to the frightened Sikhs is being viewed as a step in the right direction. The arrest of a large number of those who indulged in killing and arson has brought the flow of migrants to a trickle. Some 300 families have already moved out of Ludhiana, Jalandhar, Mohali and Patiala back to the states from which they fled.

For most Hindus, on the other hand, though the Congress(I) victory is proof of Hindu assertion, the return of peace is as dear as it is to the Sikhs. Commerce and industry, which they dominate, have suffered much. In Rajiv's victory, they see new hope. They greatly desire a decision favouring Punjab, but are doubtful about the Akali intentions. "They should stop talking about Anandpur Sahib resolution and come to terms with the Centre," warns former BJP minister Balramji Das Tandon. Whatever be the terms of agreement, peace should be ensured for the growth of industry and trade.

For a Punjab that goes dead after seven o'clock every evening, a return to normal life is vital. Once busy bazaars and crowded bus stands now wear a deserted look. Two-thirds of the trains are off the track. Buses do not ply after seven in the evening, and even bicycles are prohibited from moving about. Only the army and police move at night. This chilling stillness not only frightens but kills the spirit of life. "Punjab scares me and I can't go elsewhere," says businessman Jagdish Chand.

The yearning for peace is palpable. People ask the unending question: will there be serious efforts to bring peace and end Hindu-Sikh discord? On the surface, there is calm, but communal feelings are still growing. "I could never imagine Sikhs and Hindus talking about each other as two separate people," says the eminent writer Sant Singh Sekhon.

But the cancer of polarisation between the two communities need not grow to a terminal stage. Sant Longowal told his relations Sher Singh and Surinder Singh who met him in Udaipur jail recently that he was committed to Hindu-Sikh unity. He argued that the party needed the unity of Sikhs and Hindus for a long fight with the Centre. But he is reported to have warned that the Sikhs had made sacrifices and would not accept an unjust solution.

LOVELY LOOKS FOR YOU

The sparkle in your eyes, the gloss in your hair, the sensuousness in your lips — can make hearts beat faster. Vimal brings you tips on beauty care. So that you always have that special look about you.

Hair Affairs
You produce about 7.5 metres of hair in a lifetime. And that's plenty of hair to care about....

Massage magic: Massages improve blood circulation in your scalp. And that means better hair growth. Knead the scalp so that it moves. This loosens tense muscles. You'll feel a heady elation.

Brush it up: Brush your hair regularly. This distributes natural oil evenly in the hair and removes dirt or dandruff. A good brushing and presto! Watch your hair come to life.

Face Facts
A few tips to get a positive answer whenever you ask "mirror mirror on the wall ...."

Eye revive: Tired eyes? No problem. Dip tea bags in cold water and place them over closed eyes. Or you could even place a slice of cucumber over your eyelids. Your eyes will appreciate the coolness. Watch them sparkle.

Anti-acne: A good anti-acne treatment is an application of mint leaves' (pudina) juice. Use tepid water to wash it off the next morning.

Lip talk: Give a sensuous fullness to your lips. Apply lip colour over entire lips except the centre which should be filled in with a lighter, shimmery shade. Give a final glimmer touch by lightly brushing the lips with gold powder. You'll look wow!

Tomato tricks: Use a lot of soap? Then, your skin is being deprived of its acid layer. To remedy this, cut up a juicy tomato and rub it over your face and neck. Leave the juice on for 10 minutes. Rinse off. You'll find your skin refreshed and glowing.

Tips On Fingertips

Great nails make you look well groomed. And they'll tempt. someone to say "I wanna hold your hand..."

Nail order: You better not use your nails as tools to open up jars and packages. And wear gloves if you're helping mom with the household chores. Such pleasant gestures towards your nails will give them a better chance to shape up.

Mini manicure: Push your cuticles back by using warm vegetable oil. Apply a base coat of polish and then three more coatings, completing each application in 3 strokes. Finish the manicure with a dab of polish under the nail. And you're all set to look quite cute when you display your claws.

KARNATAKA

Getting Ready

ONLY five days after his dramatic resignation Karnataka's Chief Minister Ramakrishna Hegde stepped into Room 323, the rosewood panelled office in Vidhana Soudha, settled down on the familiar dull orange chair and told his staff bashfully: "Well, here I am. Not exactly a bad coin. But still around."

Hegde would have rather been around as an ex-chief minister with a martyr's halo than back to business as usual. By resigning and recommending dissolution last fortnight he had fondly hoped that the Congress(I), in keeping with its tradition, would either form another Gundu Rao's government of defectors or impose President's rule.

But while the local Congress(I) leaders were as usual ever willing to grab Hegde's bait, the new Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi was least intent on biting. Much to Hegde's surprise and consternation, Karnataka Governor Ashoke Nath Banerjee accepted his recommendation to dissolve the 225-member state Assembly but, nevertheless, told him firmly to be caretaker chief minister till the assembly elections were held. Hegde was unwilling at first to accept the caretakership but egged on by his partymen, who thought it profitable to be in power till the elections, he reluctantly agreed.

With Hegde's return to office the "sympathy wave" that developed after his resignation is ebbing. Now he is not only burdened with the responsibility of being chief minister, which is likely to confine him to the state, but also answerable for his government's failures till elections are held. Conceded Hegde grudgingly: "Rajiv has played his cards well so far. It is a refreshing departure from his party's old policy of flouting democratic norms."

But the chief minister had other aces up his sleeve. Soon after he joined office, the Janata Legislature Party met in their dilapidated office in Bangalore and elected Hegde as its "undisputed leader" so as to present what J.H. Patel, the party's balding secretary-general, calls "a positive approach and a unified image to the people". This was done to contrast it with the Congress(I) party which was still haggling over the leadership issue.

MUSHTAQ AHMED

Hegde with Deve Gowda and Patel: a positive approach

The Janata Party was in fact borrowing a leaf from the Congress(I) which had successfully hammered away at the opposition disunity and lack of leadership in last month's Lok Sabha poll. Last week the state Congress(I) unit showed no signs of being infused with their party's new dynamic style of functioning at the national level. Instead, the party leaders were back to their old game of asserting their closeness to the high command in Delhi.

Former chief minister Gundu Rao feels that Rajiv favours him because he was the only one granted an interview with the prime minister soon after he assumed charge while K.H. Patil, the state Congress(I) chief, hung around without any such luck. But Patil's supporters hotly refute Rao's claim stating disparagingly that it was film actor Shivaji Ganesan whom Rajiv called and Rao tagged along when he went to meet the prime minister.

Not to be outdone Patil asserted at a press conference that since he was state Congress(I) chief he was for all purposes the leader of the party till the assembly elections. Veerappa Moily, who heads the legislature party and had made a strong bid to form a government of defectors after Hegde's resignation, argued that the claim was rightly his. But the Congress(I) is unlikely to project a state leader before the elections because as one partyman put it: "The moment someone is declared leader the other aspirants would pull the rug from under his feet during elections."

Since the state Congress(I) lacks a leader of credibility and stature to match Hegde, it may be forced to fall back on Rajiv's charisma to pull it through. In fact, this is going to be the Congress(I)'s only strength in the coming assembly poll because although Hegde is an extremely popular chief minister, he could be swept out by the electorate's desire for a break from the old, a break which Rajiv symbolises. Hegde, aware that the Congress(I) may pit him against Rajiv's leadership, said: "Well, Rajiv is Rajiv and Hegde is Hegde. I will tell the people that Rajiv will not become chief minister if they voted Congress(I) but a Gundu Rao may come back."

But the state Janata Party does not seem to have learnt its lessons from the Lok Sabha poll. It is once again having trouble reaching an electoral understanding for the assembly poll with its allies the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), and the two communist parties. Last week at a party meeting, a large section refused to have any seat adjustments with the BJP. Hardliners in the party felt that the BJP would be a liability because not only are its hardcore supporters with the Congress(I) but also if the Janata had links with the BJP the minority communities may not vote for it.

Hegde was quick to realise the danger of such a move and told his partymen firmly: "The BJP has stood by us and it would be improper to let them down now. Moreover we should not split votes by having multi-cornered contests." The Janata is now working out an understanding with the BJP and is likely to concede around 20 seats. alliance are ominous portents for its chances in the polls.

Meanwhile, the Janata Party has launched its election campaign and Hegde once again hit the campaign trail last week. Said he: "This time we are going to have as close contact with the people as possible. I will tour every constituency." While the Janata Party suffers from a paucity of funds for the poll, it is certainly not lacking in morale.

ANDHRA PRADESH

Standing Firm

FOR THE Telugu Desam, it was almost as historic a mandate in Andhra Pradesh as for the Congress(I) in the rest of the country. And it looks as if the Telugu Desam's winning spree is not yet over. On January 28, when elections for the Srikakulam and Rajampet Lok Sabha constituencies are held, the party is expected to capture both, thereby bringing its presence in the new Lok Sabha to a high 30-seat mark. Both seats had been won by the Congress(I) in the last parliamentary elections, but the ruling party this time seems resigned to losing them.

Not that the Congress(I) needs any more seats after its unprecedented December landslide. With the mood resigned, the suspense missing, and the focus having shifted to the assembly elections in March, interest has been largely diffused in the Srikakulam and Rajampet elections which were postponed because of the mysterious deaths of two independent candidates—one, allegedly, a suicide and the other, a murder because of personal rivalry. This postponement, admit local Congress(I) leaders, is going to work favourably for the Telugu Desam. The diffidence is hardly surprising after the dismal rout of the Congress(I) in the state. Said Andhra Pradesh Congress(I) Committee (APCC-I) President Dr Y.S. Rajasekhar Reddy: "All that I can say is that we will not relent. I am not one to be easily cowed down. We will put up a stiff fight." Brave talk, but Congress(I) leaders at the assembly constituency and taluk level are worried by the overall poor showing of the party. The segment-by-segment analysis of the Lok Sabha results reveal that the Congress(I) led the Telugu Desam or its electoral allies in only 75 of the 280 assembly segments in the 40 constituencies of the state.

And Congress(I) prospects continue to remain gloomy in N.T. Rama Rao's fortress. For the Rajampet seat, in the south-west corner, the Telugu Desam candidate is Sugavasi Palakondarayudu,41, a former MLA. He started as a Janata man, switched mid-stream to the Congress(I) and then in August last year —after the unceremonious dismissal of the ministry—walked over to NTR, the only one from the Congress(I) to do so. What makes the contest even more poignant—and more humiliating—for the Congress(I) is the fact that APCC(I) President Reddy hails from this area. His party's candidate A. Sai Pratap, 36, shared his bench as a medical college student. It is therefore a prestigious fight for Reddy and he is planning vigorous campaigning in the constituency for a week. The Congress(I) is also deputing K. Vijayabhaskara Reddy, ex-Union industry minister, to oversee the electioneering. At the same time, the charismatic NTR will also move into the area in his Chaitanya Ratham to woo the 775,000-odd electorate.

On the north-eastern coast lies Srikakulam, site of the other election battle. The Congress(I) is posting Union Labour Minister T. Anjaiah here to woo the 692,000-odd electorate, of whom little more than half are women. The party's candidate in the constituency is the veteran Boddepalli Rajagopala Rao, 57, who has been a member of the Lok Sabha for three successive terms. A formidable candidate, he this time faces Appayya Dora, 50, a farmer and former Lok Dal activist.

In the 1983 assembly elections, the Telugu Desam had won in six of the seven assembly segments of this constituency where about 250,000 voters belong to the listed backward classes communities. Some poll analysts argue that this block, in fact, tilted the scales in favour of the Telugu Desam in December. Therefore, the prospects of another Srikakulam revolt, this time to mark the return of the Congress(I) to capture power bases, seem dim. And NTR is breaking his hectic campaign schedule to make sure that his Ratham is available for the tour in both constituencies.

Two dominant factors have worked well for the Telugu Desam: one, the undemocratic unseating of NTR in August and second, the upswing of the backward classes' vote in his party's favour. Said the exuberant Telugu Desam party General Secretary P. Upendra: "We will tell the voters that while safeguarding their interests, we have been called upon to play the role of the democratic opposition in Parliament and to strengthen our hands."

Everywhere, then, the mood is favourable towards the Telugu Desam. NTR's and Upendra's houses have been flooded with aspirants for party tickets in the assembly elections to be held in March. There are already over 7,000 applicants for the 294 constituencies—and that has not done much for the Congress(I)'s confidence, which is already at a new low in the state.

MAHARASHTRA

Crumbs of Comfort

DESPITE the Congress(I)'s overwhelming victory in Maharashtra—it won 43 of the 48 seats in the state—there were still a few crumbs of comfort for the Opposition. Notwithstanding the "wave", the party's popular vote actually declined from 52.9 per cent in 1980 to 51.29 this time. Particularly perturbing for the ruling party is the drop in popularity in its eastern citadel of Vidarbha, where the vote has dropped from 61.3 per cent to 50.2 per cent. The continued backwardness of the region, governmental neglect symbolised by the failure to form a separate regional board, a partial drought, extreme infighting in the party and unsatisfactory cotton procurement prices are all factors which have contributed to the growing disillusionment in Vidarbha with the Congress(I).

"The issues of an assembly poll are different from a parliamentary election."

SHARAD PAWAR, Congress(S)

However, the party's decline in Vidarbha and Marathwada has been balanced by its amazing improvement in Bombay and the Konkan belt, which was earlier an opposition stronghold. In addition, the ruling party has given a good account of itself in both the sugar belt in the south and in north Maharashtra. Rebels like A.R. Antulay who was hospitalised last week with heart trouble and J.B. Dhote, who left the party in a glare of publicity, put up a pathetic electoral performance.

But at least one person is convinced that the assembly polls will tell a different story: Sharad Pawar, Congress (S) president. Pawar himself was elected from Baramati with a thumping majority, and though his party captured only two of the 15 seats it contested, it has undoubtedly reaffirmed its position as the leading opposition party in the state. Party General Secretary Arun Mehta points out: "We have arisen almost from the ashes." In 1981, when senior leader Y.B. Chavan left the party along with 43 of the 49 MLA's, many thought it was the death blow. But starting from scratch with a younger generation, Pawar, who is himself only 43, has managed to emerge fairly creditably. His candidates, almost all of whom were under 40, generally gave a good performance. The Congress(S) led in 26 assembly segments and narrowly missed winning a few more seats. Pawar points out: "The issues of an assembly poll are different from a parliamentary election. And now the long-standing disenchantment in the voters over the party infighting, resulting in the crippling of the functioning of the state Government, will come to the fore."

"The opposition parties are concerned with only paying lip-service to the working class."

DATTA SAMANT, Kamgar Aghadi Party

In contrast, the other national opposition parties were badly mauled. The BJP, confident that it was the emerging force in the state, had walked out of seat adjustments claiming that other parties had overestimated their strength, but was itself badly humiliated. Out of the 20 seats it contested, it lost its deposit in seven, and was pushed to third place in half-a-dozen contests. In Nasik Buldhana and Akola, the BJP spoilt the opposition's chances of winning a seat. In Bombay, where it had the highest hopes, its alliance with the Shiv Sena cost it heavily. The Congress(I) improved its popular vote from 39.2 per cent last time to 52.8 per cent, and won so overwhelmingly that it carried every assembly segment in the five constituencies it contested. BRCC(I) President Murli Deora got 60 per cent of the vote in what a BJP leader had described as the party's "safest seat in Maharashtra". Sunil Dutt got 60 per cent against Ram Jethmalani who had dismissed the actor as "no competition". The only cold comfort that the BJP could take was that the Janata Party with whom it had a wrangle over the allotment of city seats was in third place in Bombay and Pune. But the Janata Party managed to win at least in nine assembly segments, compared to the BJP's six. And Madhu Dandavate retained his Rajapur constituency with a greatly reduced margin.

A significant trend which has emerged in this election is that a section of block voters, disillusioned with the ruling party, has opted for special interest parties. Haji Mastan's candidate in Bombay south central picked up an estimated third of the total Muslim vote, as did a Muslim League candidate in Bombay north-east. In Akola in Vidarbha, Prakash Ambedkar of the newly formed Bharatiya Republican Party (BRP) lost by only 13,000 votes and garnered the lion's share of the Scheduled Caste vote. His party put up a creditable performance in five other constituencies as well. The BRP, which has been campaigning on the popular call that Dalits should assert themselves and not be tools in the hands of other parties or mortgaged to big leaders, has obviously gained votes at the expense of established republican parties which were in alliance with the Opposition.

LABOUR leader Datta Samant successfully made an issue of the state Government's unsympathetic attitude to the long-drawn-out textile strike in Bombay, to win the election from Bombay south central against Roza Deshpande, daughter of the communist leader S.A. Dange. He was undoubtedly helped by the fact that though in alliance with the Congress(I), Deshpande insisted on fighting on her own election symbol of a pigeon, rather than the hand. Samant's Kamgar Aghadi Party, which put up candidates in three other Bombay constituencies managed to secure a respectable chunk of around 50,000 votes. The first breakdown of votes suggests that Samant has managed to woo away a section of voters who traditionally supported the Shiv Sena. Samant now plans for his party to contest 35 to 40 seats in the Bombay-Thane industrial belt for the assembly poll. He says: "The opposition parties are concerned with only paying lip-service to the working class."

Quick to see the writing on the wall, the state Janata Party unit announced that for the assembly it was going into an alliance with the Congress(S) and the Peasants and Workers Party on a common symbol. The BJP meanwhile fears it is being isolated, but it has still to make up its mind whether its alliance with the Shiv Sena stands. "Even if one marries in haste, one does not divorce in haste," says the party's Bombay President Ram Naik, still unconvinced about the enormous damage the alliance had done to the party's credibility.

Pawar, now undoubtedly in a position of strength, has said his party will be contesting around 200 seats. Within a day of his victory, he was back on a tour of the countryside that had responded so well to his call for support. Consequently, the Congress(I) was perturbed enough to demand that the Congress(S) and Antulay's Bharatiya Congress stop using the tricolour, as it was confusing voters.

This fortnight, at an MPCC(I) meeting, some Congressmen demanded action against those sabotaging the party's official candidates, a difficult demand to implement. Even Chief Minister Vasantdada Patil had remarked during the campaign that the seat of Home Minister S.B. Chavan was rather shaky thus partly confirming rumours that the chief minister was trying to sabotage his old rival's election. Chavan won by a handsome margin. Generally in Marathwada like Vidarbha, the party's position was less happy. The Congress(S) won the Aurangabad seat, and the ruling party's share of the vote fell from 54.2 per cent to 50.9 per cent.

Boosting the morale of his party workers, Pawar observed last week in Pune that the sympathy wave for the Congress(I) would soon recede. "The inability to continue to ride a wave invariably makes it unfavourable to the ruling party," said the Congress(S) leader. All the same, since the Opposition only won in 57 assembly segments out of a total of 288 in the state, it remains doubtful whether the wave can recede in time for the assembly polls, to cover up this enormous difference.

ARE THE communists in Kerala a spent force? The surprise results of last month's general elections would seem to suggest precisely that. Together the CPI(M) and CPI contested 14 of the total 20 seats in the state but while the CPI(M) managed to hold on to one seat, its fellow-traveller drew a humiliating blank everywhere. Communist leaders, however bewildered by their unambiguous rejection by the electorate, have inevitably come up with facile explanations for the disaster. "We never expected an Indira wave in Kerala," says CPI(M) strongman and former chief minister P.K. Vasudevan Nair, adding bravely, "it is only a temporary setback to the left movement."

But not many people even within the left movement can swallow the top leadership's excuses which range from "a sympathy wave" to the "Hindu backlash" and even "money power". "E.M.S. Namboodiripad (the 78-year-old CPI(M) general secretary) and the moth-eaten leadership should resign and retire from active politics if the party is to survive in Kerala," says a young party member grimly. And he is just one of the many who hold the septuagenarian leader responsible for the party's debacle at the polls as well for the fact that it is being deserted by its staunchest supporters, the youth and the working classes.

But CPI(M) leader and former chief minister E.K.Nayanar stood up for his aged colleague. "Namboodiripad is one of the greatest intellectual giants the country has ever produced," he said. "There is no question of him retiring." Nayanar was contemptuous of the argument that the party's top leadership was "too old". "Ho Chi Minh led the armed struggle in Vietnam when he was 75," he pointed out. "This theory of youngsters taking over the party is unscientific and pseudo-left."

Nevertheless, pressure on the old guard began to mount soon after it became obvious that the CPI(M) was being swept off by something of a Rajiv wave. In the round of fault-finding that followed last week at the party headquarters, Namboodiripad found himself the target of much of the attack. His fellow partymen decided in retrospect that Nomboodiripad's election tactics were all wrong. He had not been able to tell the electorate who would be prime minister if the opposition parties came to power; he had said the CPI(M) would not be party to a coalition government at the Centre; and worse, he had never taken a stand against the Hindu Front —and that might have led to the consolidation of Christian and Muslim votes for the Congress(I). "Namboodiripad by his utterances helped the Congress(I) to get all the seats they contested in Kerala," said Vayalar Ravi, state home minister, somewhat smugly.

Many partymen hold Namboodiripad responsible for the CPI(M)'s debacle as well as for the fact that it is being deserted by its staunchest supporters, the youth and the working classes.

Trivandrum provided a prime example of the CPI(M)'s dithering. They had supported DMKP's Nilalohitadasa Nadar in a triangular contest with the Congress(I)'s Abraham Charles and the Hindu Front's Kerala Varma. The CPI(M) gloated—rather prematurely—that with the Hindu Front in the fray, the Congress(I) would lose out on the Hindu votes in the constituency. On the contrary, a consolidation of Christian and Muslim votes saw Charles winning by over 50,000 votes—and even the Hindu Front candidate polled over a lakh votes, the highest ever for his party's candidates in Kerala. "The communists' politics and policies have become irrelevant in the present context," says Kerala's leading political commentator K.R. Chummar.

In fact, the Hindu Front presents the biggest threat to the communist movement in the state. Hard core CPI(M) sympathisers have evidently been won over by the Front which, although it lost all the four seats it contested, nevertheless received unprecedented support. Says P. Govindan Pillai of the CPI(M): "The support the Hindu Front received in a state where voting has always been political should make politicians sit up and take notice."

What was most shocking was the outright defeat of all the sitting MP's of the party, including politburo member E. Balanandan from Kasargod, the cradle of communism in Kerala and long considered a safe seat. Equally shattering was the defeat at Alleppey of Susheela Gopalan, widow of the legendary A.K. Gopalan, who had won the same seat with the highest majority in the state in 1980.

The only consolation for the CPI(M) was the surprise win of Suresh Kurup from Kottayam, the Christian bastion. Kurup, who at 26, is now the youngest member of Parliament, charmed the electorate with his clean image and dynamism. He certainly worked hard at it: in a move that no orthodox Marxist would care to adopt, Kurup personally met every bishop in the constituency and even paid courtesy calls to powerful anti-communist newspaper establishments at Kottayam. It paid off. "Traditionally we are Kerala Congress supporters," said Varghese Thomas, a businessman, "but this time the youth and dynamism of Suresh Kurup made us vote for him above religious considerations."

Kurup too sees his victory as a vote for youth. "My victory is a tremendous boost for youngsters in the state. We will revive the communist movement in the state," he says. A.C. Shanmughdas, a Congress(S) MLA who is close to the CPI(M) leadership, says: "The Left Democratic Front should use its defeat to clear out its ideological differences and find a confident voice to inspire the youngsters in the state." Shanmughdas's advice also implies a warning: the results of the three by-elections being held late this month may well decide the possibility of mid-term elections to the Assembly, and give the communists, their last chance to recover lost ground.

BIHAR

The Victory War

THE TWO Bihar Congress(I) arch-antagonists are at it again. To see Jagannath Mishra and Chief Minister Chandrashekhar Singh —and their supporters —slug it out, anyone would think their party suffered a humiliating electoral defeat instead of a superlative, historic win. Unfortunately the party lost six seats in Bihar. And that was enough cause for the chief minister's men and the former chief minister's men to start a slanging match about "manoeuvring".

In focus was the sensitive seat of Darbhanga, where the Congress(I) candidate, former Union minister of state Harinath Mishra was defeated by the DMKP's Vijay Kumar Mishra—who happens to be Jagannath Mishra's nephew. "Dr Jagannath Mishra not only manoeuvred the defeat of Harinath Mishra, he organised booth-capturing and used his black money to get his nephew elected," alleged Darbhanga District Congress Committee(I) chief Harish Chandra Jha, who demanded his expulsion.

There's more to the Bihar shenanigans than just the defeat of a few candidates. According to party sources, the defeats, particularly that of Harinath Mishra who was once a serious contender for chief ministership, symbolised the fight for supremacy between Jagannath Mishra and the Chandrashekhar Singh-Nagendra Jha (education minister) combine, specially in the Mithila region from where Jagannath Mishra hails. An earlier statement signed by 51 legislators stating that Nagendra Jha and Harinath Mishra had worked for the ouster of Jagannath Mishra had greatly angered the people of Mithila—of which Darbhanga is a part. Harinath Mishra's defeat, say the former chief minister's supporters, is the "revenge" of the people of Mithila. Says a derisive Jagannath Mishra supporter, Kamalnath Singh Thakur: "It is a shameless cover-up game being played by Nagendra Jha, who was the election-in-charge of Harinath Mishra. Jha has become so unpopular in the area," he adds, "that if he's given the party ticket this time, he will lose his assembly seat. In a bid to divert the high command's attention, he is indulging in gimmicks."

Nagendra Jha has reason to worry about the defeat, because of Rajiv Gandhi's warning that sitting MLA's would be denied party tickets for the assembly polls if the party's candidates for the Lok Sabha polls lost in their assembly segments. Harinath Mishra lost in all the six assembly segments of Darbhanga constituency, including Manigachi which Nagendra Jha represents.

K.M. KISHAN

Another alarming signal for the chief minister's men in this defeat is that at least in Mithila, the Jagannath Mishra factor is still strong. DCC(I) general secretary Tilaknath Mishra explains that the chief minister erred in seeking in his election speeches a "vote for Harinath Mishra to strengthen the hands of Nagendra Jha"—the predominantly Brahmin voters interpreted this as a challenge to their favourite, Jagannath Mishra. For his part, the powerful Brahmin dissident carefully avoided campaigning in Darbhanga.

Party leaders have now begun to recall Jagannath Mishra's rather ominous statement three months ago that his commitment to maintain unity within the party and cooperate with Chandrashekhar Singh would last until the Lok Sabha elections. He himself has made no further comment on this, but his supporters have already begun lobbying for a change of leadership before the polls. They say Chandrashekhar Singh's "bureaucratic image" and the lack of coordination between the party and the Government would mar the Congress(I)'s chances of winning the assembly elections.

The chief minister himself had bad news when he made a department-wise assessment of plan performance. Not only did he discover irregularities, he found to his dismay that some departments had not even managed to use 45 per cent of the funds in nine months' time. Mishra supporters naturally flaunted this as the Government's "record non-performance". While admitting that Singh had indeed tried hard to meet his commitments only to be handicapped by a corrupt and inefficient administrative machinery, a senior leader said: "Such a poor record would not only invite the wrath of Rajiv Gandhi but also result in a drastic cut in the allocation for the next financial year."

Meanwhile, reports reached the state party headquarters last week that the high command had begun conducting a secret inquiry into the role of those leaders who had allegedly worked against party candidates in the Lok Sabha elections. Pradesh Congress Committee(I) chief Bindeshwari Dubey also sent a confidential circular to all DCC(I) presidents seeking their reports on the role of party leaders and workers in their areas. But these developments have only fuelled the infighting in the party.

The chief minister, apart from being caught in the battles and shows of strength, also faces another problem: with four of his ministerial colleagues sent to the Eighth Lok Sabha, another reshuffle of the Cabinet is on the cards. But experience has shown such a move only creates more enemies within the party. No respite seems likely for Chandrashekhar Singh, at least in the near future.

MANIPUR

Prospects of Peace

THREE decades of insurgency in the remote north-eastern state of Manipur appears to have only strengthened the people's resolve to remain in the national mainstream. This was clear from the unexpected performance of the Congress(I) in the recent elections. For the first time since the formation of the state in 1972, the Congress(I) won 38 of the 58 seats declared, a majority no other party had ever achieved in the 60-member Assembly. Apart from this, both the Lok Sabha seats in the state also went to the Congress(I).

With this outright majority, and a host of independents clamouring to be admitted, the Congress(I) had no problem in forming a ministry. Last fortnight Rishang Keishing was reappointed chief minister by the high command emissary Hiteswar Saikia.

Most relieved by the electoral verdict was Keishing, for whom defeat would have meant living as a fugitive from the vengeful insurgent group, the National Socialist Council of Nagaland (NSCN). With this solid support behind him the chief minister appeared determined to go all out for the NSCN with army help.

In his first press conference after assuming office, Keishing declared that "the Naga rebels would be treated as criminals". So confident was the chief minister that he even suggested that the Armed Forces Special Powers Act imposed in the state three years ago could be revoked as the situation had returned to "near normal".

Keishing seems keen on diffusing as many problems as possible. Perhaps realising that the electoral victory of the ex-leader of the People's Liberation Army (PLA), N. Bisheswar Singh, could pose a problem in future if not handled properly, Keishing allowed the ex-PLA leader's release from prison. Bisheswar, who has been in jail since his capture in 1981, continues to be an immensely popular figure in Manipur, judging from the spontaneous celebrations in Imphal that followed his election victory. At the moment, Keishing has claimed that Bisheswar wants to join the Congress(I) but whether the PLA leader will go the whole hog in asking his former comrades to lay down their arms is not known.

In the hilly Naga-dominated regions of Manipur too, insurgency shows no signs of abating. Although Keishing, himself a Thangkul Naga, won from a constituency in the middle of rebel country, his partymen did not fare all that well. Of the 19 assembly seats in the hills only nine were won by the ruling party, while the rest went to independents. The Congress(I)'s main success was in the plains where it had won only four seats (out of a total of 13) in the last assembly elections. All the same, Keishing can take some comfort from the fact that there are indications that the Nagas want peace and a government capable of containing the militant rebels.

Rishang Keishing

Bisheswar Singh

It's not clear whether Singh will now abjure insurgency and offer a Laldenga-type peace offer. Neither has Keishing agreed to grant him amnesty.

The Congress(I) also managed to retain the Outer Manipur Lok Sabha seat which covers the hill areas of the state. In Ukhrul district, the hotbed of NSCN activity, a record 70 per cent of voters braved the icy winter wind to cast their votes most of which went to the Congress(I). "Many ordinary villagers here are disgusted with the rebels and want peace," said a young second-lieutenant in charge of a lonely army outpost in the hills of Ukhrul. The growing unpopularity of the NSCN, according to the army, is the practice of forcible "tax" collection from the wretchedly poor villagers. According to one estimate, the NSCN collected as much as Rs 30 lakh during 1982-83.

"Most Nagas have very large families and cannot afford to pay taxes but usually pay up," says the army officer. Refusal to pay the taxes or shelter the rebels means execution, which explains the killing of as many as 88 people by the NSCN in the past few years. The disenchantment with the rebels is also proved by the disastrous showing of NSCN candidates in the district council polls held last year. But nobody here can dismiss the armed terror of the rebels and even Keishing is reported to have sent a peace delegation to the leader Muivasn Tangkhul before the elections. The chief minister had denied this report but had admitted that the "people of Ukhrul have sent five churchmen across the border to meet the NSCN and start peace talks".

The threat of continuing violence is not restricted to the hills of Manipur. According to recent reports collected by the army, the course of insurgent activity in the plains will depend not so much on Bisheswar Singh as on the present PLA chief, Temba Singh. About 90 PLA activists along with Temba Singh are currently undergoing training in guerrilla warfare in the Kachin area of Burma with the NSCN's help. Insurgency may become more difficult to combat if the NSCN's "foreign secretary", Angelus Shimray, succeeds in uniting the six extremist groups in the region: the NSCN, PLA, Federal Government of Nagaland, People's Revolutionary Party of Kangleipak (PREPAK), Kangleipak Communist Party and the Mizo National Front.

While insurgency will continue to plague Keishing he has been spared challenges within his party. Former Congress(I) chief minister R.K. Dorendra, and deputy chief minister I. Tompok Singh, both of whom had aspirations for the chief ministership have been neutralised by the announcement that Keishing was the "unanimous and democratic" choice. The other parties, notably the Manipur People's Party, the CPI, and the Janata have also been humbled, giving Keishing a clear mandate for restoring peace in this strife-torn state. —INDRANIL BANERJIE

MADHYA PRADESH

Painful Indecision

MORE than a month after the Bhopal gas tragedy, the problems it has thrown up are still far from being resolved. Over the past fortnight the complicated issues were taken to the streets with various citizen groups organising demonstrations to protest the inadequacy of relief measures undertaken by the Government. While Chief Minister Arjun Singh dismissed the demonstrations with the comment "it is distressing that people are trying to play politics in relation to even this issue," he did meet a 28-member delegation of the Jaharili Gas Kand Sangharsh Morcha on January 4 and address the demonstrators. His assurances, however, failed to impress the Morcha representatives and their dharna outside Singh's residence continues. In New Delhi last fortnight, the new Rajiv Gandhi ministry was quick to show its concern for Bhopal victims by sending the Minister of State for Law and Justice, H.R. Bharadwaj, for an on-the-spot survey of the various ramifications. Bharadwaj on his return announced that the Attorney General K. Parasaran was being sent to the US to consult legal opinion on the maintainability of action and jurisdiction of American courts over charges to be filed by gas victims at state expense.

Not withstanding such signs of hope for the gas victims, it is still unclear why the lack of direction still persists. The dilly-dallying is best illustrated by the functioning of the 36-member state level relief and rehabilitation committee, set up on December 5 with Singh at its head. Despite its two meetings—on December 6 and 27—it has yet to arrive at any major decision except to set up two seven-member subcommittees. The financial relief subcommittee with Bhopal Mayor R.K. Bisariya as convenor decided that ex gratia payment to victims would be made after a survey and that the director of veterinary services would undertake a survey on dead cattle. Nothing concrete appears to have been done on both counts. The rehabilitation subcommittee convened by the chief minister's wife, Saroj Singh, decided in its only meeting that milk would be distributed free to children and lactating mothers—the only step of any consequence.

In every area of government the lethargy is evident and the only major decisions relate to the distribution of free milk and ration. Apart from 11,000 litres of milk being given out per day, the Government announced that all families in the affected areas of the old city would be given 3 kg of wheat and rice per unit, on their ration card, for December. The benefit was later extended to January—and 12 kg per unit—and for all slum-dwellers of the city, including new Bhopal, because of the severe dislocation in city life over the last month. By January 6, over 850 tonnes of wheat and 410 tonnes of rice had already been distributed through 180 centres. Edible oil and sugar are also being distributed.

But the logistics created problems too. Nearly, 21,000 temporary ration cards had to be made almost overnight for residents who had none. Officials agree that many bogus applications had been entertained, but then the burden of work and short notice left them no option.

The single biggest ground for resentment among the survivors is the delayed distribution of ex gratia by the Government, which had announced that Rs 10,000 would be given to the heir of every dead, Rs 2,000 to those seriously affected and Rs 100 to Rs 1,000 to those slightly affected. In its initial panic the Government decided to rush the payment and Rs 36.67 lakh was paid in cash as ex gratia to 5,724 victims.

The haphazard manner was clearly a mistake, and within four days the Government suspended the operation because it had the potential of creating serious law and order problems. It was declared that the disbursement would be resumed on December 12—and payment would be by cheque—only after a quick house to house survey of the affected localities.

But it remained suspended well into January when payments to the relatives of the dead were resumed. According to informed sources, no decision could be taken on who would take responsibility for what was clearly a thankless job: neither the Finance Department nor the district authorities wanted to assume the burden of sorting the really needy from the avaricious who were sure to claim that they too were affected. Therefore, payments to them have been withheld owing to lack of positive identification.

The key questions remain: Who is an "affected" person? Which is the "seriously affected area"? Says an official: "Every local leader claims that his area is affected. In a sense that is true because most of the city's population was either medically affected or dislocated during Operation Faith, if not earlier. But does that mean that the Government will pay ex gratia to each of Bhopal's 8 lakh citizens?"

The authorities are unwilling to take a stand. If they identify the slightly and seriously affected they will be stuck with demands for money from a huge population which they cannot satisfy. And with the postponed parliamentary election due on January 28, they are just sitting out the problem for the time being. But the net result is that the really needy, many of whom are unable to resume work because of illness, are not getting their just dues.

Argues Vibhuti Jha, a local lawyer, and a Morcha leader: "Surely there is no dispute about the fact that everyone in the settlements immediately around the factory inhaled large quantities of methyl isocyanate (MIC). Why isn't everyone in these areas getting Rs 2,000 per head as per the administration's promise?" The Government considers this demand unreasonable but can offer no solution of its own either. It has only agreed to settle the ex gratia claims of the 1,404 officially declared dead.

Providing relief to the owners of the 1,776 cattle and goats killed by MIC poses similar problems. In principle the administration has agreed to compensate them but according to one official "corporators of various wards are making such exaggerated claims that it is no longer possible to determine the truth from the lies". And, therefore, this money isn't being released either.

If identifying the genuinely needy from the bogus poses a problem to officials handling the distribution of relief for material loss, officials in the Health Department have a problem many times that size. They are yet unable to detail how precisely tabs will be kept on the condition of virtually thousands of people who have inhaled MIC. The documentation of these cases is essential not only for medical reasons but from the legal point of view as well. The extent of injury suffered is a vital issue in any case of compensation be it in an Indian or an American court. As of now, the only thing definitely known is that the lungs and eyes have been damaged. But in each case, the extent of injury will have to be quantified: merely arguing that a person was admitted to hospital following MIC poisoning will not do in court.

Already, only a month after the tragedy, government officers are unable to distinguish a seriously affected victim from a normal person or a slightly affected one. How then, with the existing limited documentation, will victims establish in a court of law several months or years later that their illness is the result of MIC and not something else? Says 30-year-old Garish Sarin, a California-based attorney: "Carbide is going to use everything it has to disprove claims. If a person has no medical proof, he may as well say goodbye to compensation."

PREMJI Srivastava, secretary of the State Legal Aid Board, while willing to talk of the rush of people to fill forms for the case which the Madhya Pradesh Government has decided to file in the US, seems to treat the issue of medical documentation as of no consequence currently: "Our first priority is to fill the forms. We can deal with the medical problem when it arises." But later may be too late.

There is another danger. American lawyers may hire doctors to record the medical condition of their clients but it is going to mean huge expenses to cater to so many thousands. The fear is that they may consider it a viable proposition only to fight cases of death and the very seriously affected, which may mean that partly affected people are left high and dry.

The Government's extraordinary attitude of secrecy right from day one has led to needless speculation, rumours and doubts. Whether it was the abrupt closure of schools and colleges without assigning reasons last month before Operation Faith or the manner of neutralising MIC; whether it was the question of the quantity of MIC to be neutralised or the nature of air, water and plant safety tests; whether it was the names of the dead on the official list or details of the manner in which ex gratia had been distributed, very little information was forthcoming.

Also curious was the state Government's anxiety at the writ petition filed at the high court in Jabalpur on behalf of a Bhopal citizen, by lawyer Rakesh Shrouti, on December 16. The petition sought that the Government be directed not to neutralise the entire quantity of MIC and a sample be preserved for the commission of enquiry that has been set up to go into the tragedy. It also asked that the equipment should not be tampered with.

The high court vacation judge B.M. Lal directed that 15 kg of MIC be put in three containers and put under the custody of the district and sessions judge at Bhopal. On December 19, however, Union Carbide and the state Government moved an application arguing that it was not feasible, indeed dangerous, to preserve this amount of MIC. The judge modified the earlier order and reduced the quantity to 1,500 gms. Union Carbide and the Government moved fresh applications stating that even such a quantity could not be safely stored. At the final hearing, on January 4, a division bench comprising Justice Faizamuddin and Justice M.D. Bhatt directed that not only the quantity of MIC be preserved for the inquiry commission, but also ordered a re-analysis of the chemical. The justices ruled that while the re-analysis would take place under the direct supervision of CSIR chief Dr Vardarajan, a scientist of the petitioner's choice could also be present. The anxiety of a government which once thought nothing of storing nearly 90 tonnes of MIC, over being required to preserve even a sample of the toxic chemical, is seen as something suspect by many.

If the Government is faced with a problem of credibility it has only itself to blame. At no point has it bothered to take the public into confidence. Though the chief minister asserts that "we are not tinkering with the problem," nothing has been done to rehabilitate the families of those dead or those too ill. It awaits the results of a detailed survey being conducted by the Tata Institute of Social Sciences, along with other organisations, of about 25,000 families. Mrs Nirmala Buch, secretary of the state level relief and rehabilitation committee, says that it will be completed by January end. But again, it may take some time before the findings are tabulated. Meanwhile, the survivors, it would seem, will simply have to learn to wait.

LET'S LOOK AT THE TWO KINDS OF FACTS ABOUT HOW INDIA'S LARGEST COMPUTER COMPANY GOT TO BE TWICE AS LARGE AS ITS CLOSEST COMPETITOR.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The horrible facts as stated by our competitors

It's common knowledge that ICIM is always out to put competition on the rocks by not only monopolizing the big customers, but by also over eagerly servicing the smaller ones.

Many enterprising companies were prevented from pioneering any of the four generations of computers in India because ICIM pioneered all four of them.

In a Third World situation where most companies have to get by on hand-me-down technology, they unsportingly use the latest international technology to make a whole range of mini and mainframe computers that are world-class and upgradeable.

All their software packages are tested on installations all over the world. This is hardly necessary.

Using their massive buying power, they've hired a large, highly professional staff and given them the opportunity to design more than 50 different systems.

They've made keeping up with the Joneses virtually impossible for everybody else by opening up 83 fully equipped service centres spread all over the country.

They've discouraged healthy competition by developing the ability to deliver esoteric services such as Networking.

The happy facts as stated by ourselves

We don't ever discriminate between our large and small clients. We service them both to the best of our ability. In fact 80% of our customers are medium-sized business houses.

Besides being the first company to manufacture computers in India, we also pioneered all the generations of computers.

We use the latest international technology to make a whole range of mini and mainframe computers that are worldclass and upgradeable.

We further utilize our multinational connections to have our software packages tested and proved on installations worldwide which makes installation twice as fast as anybody else.

We have a highly professional staff working with us. They're given every opportunity to advance their experience. They've designed over 50 systems, twice as many as anybody else.

Our after-sales service is very thorough by the virtue of our having 83 fully equipped service centres spread all over the country. Twice as many as anybody else.

And we are the only company who can actually execute a Networking operation.

DELHI RIOTS

The Crucial Probe

TEN WEEKS after the bloody riots in Delhi that left over 2,000 Sikhs dead, the accountability, or lack of it, for the massacre still continues to haunt the future of a majority of the capital's Sikh population, 2,000 of whom are still living in refugee camps. Many of them see their only glimmer of hope in the team led by Additional Commissioner of Police Ved Marwah, appointed recently to probe into the riots. However, the fact that the list of those guilty of instigating or actively participating in the riots would undoubtedly include a number of police officials has endowed the Marwah report with unusual interest and significance.

Over the last two months, at least 1,000 Sikhs have testified before the team and in most cases have alleged open police connivance. The team has also been inquiring into the reasons why some police stations refused to register cases and Station House Officers (SHO's) have been asked for explanations.

Marwah, a quiet, efficient officer, however, appears confident that the inquiry report, due in the first week of February, will be an independent and fair assessment. "Our probe will cover all aspects of the riots but whether or not the report will be made public is still to be decided," he says. Both Marwah and Police Commissioner S.S. Jog have a reputation for being tough disciplinarians and current indications are that the team will not succumb to political pressure or whitewash their colleagues. If that does come true, indications are that at least 10 senior police officers will be indicted for negligence or for openly conniving with the rioters.

According to sources, serious charges could be brought against one additional commissioner of police, two deputy commissioners, three assistant commissioners (one of whom has already been transferred) and six SHOs, three of whom have already been issued transfer orders. So far, in connection with the riots, only one police officer, the SHO of Kalyanpuri, has been charged under a criminal case.

The probe team has considerable evidence in the form of eye-witness accounts by victims which indicate that:

► In Delhi cantonment, where 300 Sikhs were massacred, the police control room was informed as late as November 7 by the local police that only 3 people had died.

► In Trilokpuri, there was a criminally fatal delay on the part of the police to reach the riot spots.

► Innumerable eye-witness accounts all over Delhi have charged the police with actively participating in the looting of shops.

Widows of Sikhs killed in the riots protesting in Delhi against harassment and (inset) Marwah: credibility question

Marwah concedes that much of the information the team is gathering has been garnered from reports in the media which were found to be usually accurate. The team, however, has gone about its task in as fair a manner as possible by writing to individual policemen suspected of complicity and asking for their comments. So far, the answers have mainly been evasive, pointing instead to the limited force available. Several policemen have, however, complained that there was a lack of direction on the part of senior officials as well as a reluctance to accept responsibility in the event of the police being forced to open fire on the mobs.

But the main problem facing any probe of this kind will undoubtedly be the involvement of prominent ruling party politicians in the riots and whether or not they will get off scot-free. The inquiries as well as media reports have established the role of one sitting MP and prominent supporters of at least two other former Congress(I) MP's. But officers connected with the probe express doubts as to whether those named will actually be indicted in the final report, especially since many of the displaced Sikhs still claim that their lives are being threatened.

Following the appointment of Marwah, 375 cases have been registered against people involved in the rioting. Of these, the largest number, 131, were registered in south Delhi. But this seemed hardly adequate considering that almost all the 3,000 people arrested after the riots were released on bail or merely with a warning. What is worse is that the arrest records show that the areas which witnessed the worst rioting saw the fewest arrests. In Kalyanpuri, only two stray cases were registered while only three cases each were registered in Sultanpuri and Mongolpuri. Little wonder that 2,000 Sikhs from these localities are still refusing to leave the sanctuary of their three camps.

The Sikhs are also upset at the slow pace of compensation. Delhi administration officials claim that till the first week of January, Rs 4.3 crore had been paid as compensation to those who lost family members or had their dwellings destroyed. They also say that nationalised banks have disbursed Rs 22.71 crore at a concessional rate of interest of 12.5 per cent to industrial units destroyed in the riots.

Sikh spokesmen, however, say that any number of Sikhs are still to receive compensation and many others have yet to file their claims. Officials claim that they have to go slow because of the unusually high number of false claims being lodged, as high as 55 per cent according to official figures. But ultimately, it is the Marwah probe that will represent the biggest test of the Government's credibility as far as the Sikhs are concerned as well as the restoration of their feeling of security.

Diversionary Tactics

IF IT was meant to divert public attention from the humiliating defeat of the National Conference (Khalida)-Congress(I) combine in Jammu & Kashmir, it didn't succeed. Last fortnight, when Devi Dass Thakur, the dapper deputy chief minister released a 133-page "White Paper" on the Farooq Government's alleged objectional activities while in power, it failed to generate the expected public condemnation of Farooq. The charges substantiated by the report were the same old chestnuts pulled repeatedly out by the Congress(I) and the NC(K) during their campaigning in the state. The response to it was that it was nothing but "witch-hunting" by the state Government, clinging precariously to power.

The responses of both the Congress(I) and Farooq himself to it were typical: if Srikant Verma, the new AICC(I) general secretary exulted: "It has vindicated our earlier stand that the Farooq Government was hob-nobbing with anti-national elements," Farooq himself treated it with disdain: "I am prepared to face the gallows if any of the charges are proved in court. The people of Kashmir have already given a verdict on their baseless insinuations."

The Thakur panel scrutinised over 4,000 government files before coming to its conclusions, indicting the former chief minister on several counts including security of the state, communal harmony, national integrity, abuse of official position, favouritism and financial irregularities. Some of the charges:

- the Farooq government had adopted a too-lenient attitude toward Sikh and Muslim extremists in the valley;
- it had released on parole all detenus who were allegedly involved in 29 cases of bomb explosions in the state;
- it had misappropriated funds in buying a helicopter and a fleet of trucks from a private agency and indulged in gross financial indiscipline.

But clearly the panel's most important concern was with Farooq's alleged relationship with the extremists in the valley. In fact, even before Farooq's ouster, the late prime minister Indira Gandhi and Rajiv Gandhi had cried themselves hoarse about Farooq "protecting" Sikh extremists.

The report indicts the previous government for, among other things, revoking the detention of 31 alleged antinational activists on purely technical grounds. It says their detention orders were not confirmed by the advisory boards within the stipulated time, because inexplicably enough, the district authorities did not put up the cases for confirmation. "Circumstances suggest that Dr Farooq Abdullah and his government encouraged the anti-national elements by conniving at their activities, and as a result, a serious threat to the security and integrity of the nation has been posed," says the report. But it goes on to make a suprising comment on the defections and the toppling of Farooq's government: "If the members of the Assembly belonging to the National Conference had not realised the threat and had not withdrawn their support from the Government headed by Dr Farooq Abdullah, a very grave situation would have arisen."

Farooq (above) and Thakur: paper ploy

Since the G.M. Shah Government's primary objective was to expose Farooq's "anti-national activities", the panel made only cursory inquiries into the other charges tabulated. But the timing of the report's release is significant. The decision was taken in New Delhi last month when Chief Minister Shah and Governor Jagmohan flew into the capital to meet the prime minister, Home Minister S.B. Chavan and other Home Ministry officials. Ever since the December polls which clearly emphasised Farooq's popularity in the sensitive state, the deposed chief minister has been urging the Congress(I) to withdraw its support to the Shah Government and call for assembly elections. The Centre opted for an offensive against Farooq in making the report public.

In fact, state Congress(I) MLA's complained that senior pro-Farooq civil and police officials were trying to sabotage the report because it would disclose their involvement in the murky dealings. Evidently Shah agreed with them. Soon after his return from New Delhi, he sacked about 10 officials and ordered a major reshuffle of the state civil and police set-up. Among the officials affected were Director General of Police, Peer Ghulam Shah, and Deputy Inspector General A.M. Watali, who were transferred. With these "pro-Farooq" officials out, the Government strove to expedite the report.

Politically, such a move was of tremendous tactical value to Shah, especially in the face of Farooq's obviously conciliatory stance towards Rajiv Gandhi. Even after the parliamentary elections, Farooq had offered his cooperation to the young prime minister. Indeed, even for the Congress(I), a rapprochement with the former chief minister, who has shown himself to be invincible in the valley, would make sense, and several party leaders had advocated this. However Shah has evidently been able to prevail upon the Central leadership to stand by him and rebuff any advances from his rival. But with the first round of the electoral battle lost, the state Government report seems unlikely to serve much purpose beyond burdening some dusty shelf in the state's archives.

INDIAN ARMY

Asking for More

UNKNOWN to the world outside, the Indian army, over the past few months, has been engaged in unconventional warfare. There are no gallantry awards at stake, nor are the men in olive-green fighting for territorial gains. It's all, in a way, for a few hundred rupees more. As a senior officer summed it up: "It's a tussle against the bureaucracy that has an inbuilt resistance to the army getting its due and the popular prejudice that merely putting a man in uniform makes him patriotic and keen to sacrifice his life for the country. All we want is an adequate cash compensation for the work we soldiers do."

The army's concept of "adequate compensation" has been explained in detail in a 326-page document submitted to the Fourth National Pay Commission now sitting in the capital's Vigyan Bhavan annexe. Gaining exclusive details from it, INDIA TODAY found that the army's case has undoubtedly been argued strongly in the deftly drafted document. And even if the demand for a starting basic pay of at least Rs 2,200 per month plus allowances for a second lieutenant and the maximum basic pay of Rs 8,800 for a lieutenant-general raises eyebrows, there is no denying that steps need to be taken urgently to remove the army's personnel problems. Whether that can be done without an above 100 per cent increase in the Defence Ministry's wage bill is another matter.

The case for drastic hikes is based on the argument of increasing shortfalls in the vital arms of the country's land forces. Based on figures that sound nothing short of alarming, the army argues that it is the lack of financial reward that is increasingly keeping good, capable men away from the armed forces, leaving various units and specialised arms to operate at starvation levels (see charts). Also, there is a worrisome increase in the number of officers and men seeking early retirement. The grimness of the situation can be gauged from the following examples:

► Of the troops selected for training nearly 10 per cent are unable to join the army ultimately due to various reasons. But as many as 37.5 per cent don't get into uniform because they choose desertion to the harsh military life. The authors of the army document, the adjutant-general's branch, blame it on "quick disillusionment" of men "sucked into the army enamoured by the prospect of a secure career and adequate remuneration and perquisites (particularly rations)".

► In the last four years the shortage of number of matriculates available to fulfil the demand for sepoys has gone up from 32 to 40 per cent. At the same time there is no substantial shortage in the number of uneducated men available for sepoys' jobs, leading the army to argue that their basic problem is not so much the number of recruits but that the present salaries do not attract the people with the right kind of attitudes and education.

► In the Indian Military Academy, the main feeder institution for the officer cadres, the shortfall of recruits in engineering branches has gone up from 18.3 per cent in 1976-77 to 75.06 per cent in 1982-83. Even more pathetic is the state of affairs at the Officers' Training School (OTS) where the technical course has been discontinued from 1982-83 "on account of inadequate response".

► In all courses, including combatants and supporting services, the Indian Military Academy has had, on an average, 18 per cent vacancies in the previous decade. For OTS the figure is a staggering 35.5 per cent.

► In the Army Medical Corps only 34 officers applied for premature retirement in 1979. In 1983 the number had gone up to 81. Of these, 44 were above the rank of lieutenant-colonel. This is even more striking considering that in the whole branch, in the normal course, only 38 officers were actually scheduled to retire in 1983.

► In the judge advocate general's branch, that handles the army's internal legal cases and problems, the shortfall is now 64 per cent. The law graduates just do not want to join.

► The same problem prevails in practically all arms ranging from Remount and Veterinary Corps, which has nearly 30 per cent of jobs vacant, to the special commando units which just do not seem to get volunteers.

► Of the cadets graduating out of Indian Military Academy at least 30 per cent more are placed below 'C' grade today than were a decade ago.

If the paucity of men opting for the defence forces in spite of widespread unemployment is not paradoxical enough, there is more of it in the way the trend has changed on the preferences of those joining the army. Over the years, the popular perception of the elitist wings of the army has been the fighting arms: the cavalry, infantry and artillery. On the other hand, wings like Army Service Corps, which looks after supplies and transport, and Army Ordnance Corps, which looks after the weapon inventories have been considered Cinderella services. But figures now tell a different tale. Between 1966 and 1970, for every 100 posts of officers in the artillery there were 85 volunteers. Today there are merely 56. For infantry, the number of volunteers has come down from 79 to 63. But more significantly, the number of applicants for every 100 posts in Army Service Corps has risen in the same period from 114 to 217. The increase is even steeper for the Army Ordnance Corps—159 to 350.

Clearly, more and more young men today either do not want to join the forces or are looking for softer options that involve lesser risks. Says a general: "Our problem is simple. First of all we do not get the best recruits. The most promising ones go into medicine, engineering, business and other professions. We normally make up for this initial lack of quality by stringent training. But what will we do with men who are just not motivated to fight and take risks? It is painful, but the time has finally come to ask, who will fight for India?"

BUT WHAT will reverse the trend? The army argues that more bucks will do the trick. It says that the two things that make a soldier fight with a will to sacrifice are the elitist feeling of being in the army and the traditional concept of izzat (dignity) of the soldier. The progressive decline in his living standard has robbed him of both to some degree. Said a general: "In the British times the Government went out of its way to give the forces an elitist image. There was pride of uniform and generous compensation for special, hazardous jobs like paratrooping and commando branches. But over the years, these special allowances have not kept pace with inflation. The very idea of giving these allowances was to tell the soldiers that to become the elite of the elite they had to opt for riskier jobs. That dividing line has faded now."

For starters the army asks for three months' salary as a lump sum grant to young men on the threshold of their careers, opting for important but unpopular disciplines like infantry, artillery and signals. Within the fighting arms, better wages have been recommended for high-risk jobs. For example, officers opting for the para units now get a mere Rs 55 per month as special pay. A jawan gets only Rs 20. The document states that in a paradrop, it is expected that 20 per cent of the troops will suffer casualties within the first 48 hours of the operation and the figure is only likely to increase with the advent of new electronic devices that make secret paradrops almost impossible.

Another bizarre anomaly is that though a paratrooper dying in a plane crash while on his way to a dropping zone gets full ex gratia payment like any crash victim, he is deprived of it in case he dies because his parachute failed to open. Similarly, the officer opting for the toughest of all army disciplines, the commandos, gets a special pay of only Rs 200 per month (the jawan gets Rs 70). Even this is not given to him if he is not a paratrooper besides being a commando. The men in the commando units specialising in the even riskier underwater operations get a ridiculous "dip money" of Rs 75 per month, calculated on the basis of the amount they spend under water every month at "15 to 95 paise per minute depending on the depth to which an individual has been diving". Understandably volunteers are hard to get for these disciplines. "These," said a Defence Ministry official, "are special units which just have to be built around volunteers. You can't force just anyone to become a commando."

In bureaucratic circles there is considerable scepticism in the kind of pay-scales the forces have sought, but the demand for special allowances for specialised jobs finds a more favourable response. For example, there is some justification in asking for a hike in field posting allowance and separation allowance for married officers who have to run two establishments while serving in the forward areas. Similar hikes have been asked for in the high altitude allowance, snowbound area allowance and hard area allowance. But it is unlikely that any finance man will agree to give all of these together to an army man on posting, say, in Dras in Ladakh which will fall in all three categories. The army also wants income tax concessions on most of these allowances. There is also the quest for rationalisation of outdated allowances. In 1950 when a Gurkha soldier went to Nepal on leave he was given a rupee a day for hiring a porter on his trek to the village from nearest rail or roadhead. This is obviously ridiculous now and the army wants it raised to at least Rs 15 a day. There are plenty of similar examples.

While the demands cut across a wide range of subjects, from better pensions to speedy promotion to naik (corporal) level for jawans and from increased kit maintenace allowance to conveyance allowance and a nominal entertainment allowance for senior officers, there are also aspects in the list that clearly betray the eternal ego problem between the uniformed forces and bureaucracy. There is, for example, the demand that civil officers should give prompt and preferential treatment to the defence services officers who visit their offices.

The defence forces think this is their best time for squeezing concessions out of the Government. Even though the last decade has had no wars, it has proved the army's importance in internal security. In fact, the document begins with a mention of Operation Bluestar in Punjab and continues to describe the role played by the army in Punjab, Assam and insurgency-prone north-eastern states. But that, ironically, may prove to be a tactical error. For, as a Finance Ministry official candidly put it, no administration is going to like being told that the forces' are becoming more important because they (the civil officers) can't run the country well enough. But the brass and bureaucracy are old adversaries, and this time the forces do not seem to be in a mood to throw in the towel in a hurry.

The Union Carbide plant in Virginia: raising crucial questions

CHEMICAL PLANTS

Exporting Hazards

THE BHOPAL tragedy, in addition to highlighting the widespread danger from chemical and industrial pollution within the United States, has also underscored another dangerous development: the increasing export of hazardous manufacturing plants from the United States and many of the other industrial nations to the Third World.

As hazardous and polluting industries have come under increasing regulation in industrial nations and as environmental protection groups have gained social, economic and political acceptance and momentum, these nations have begun to export plants for these products to Third World countries in what are known here as "runaway shops". The reasons, according to Barry Castleman, a recognised authority on the environment, are obvious: "Cheap and ignorant labour is abundant. Runaway shops can then market their products in industrial nations with the competitive advantage of not having had to comply with costly workplace and also pollution control regulations."

In what is perhaps the only comprehensive study of this problem, Castleman predicts that in the next decade the export of hazards from the US to the Third World will increase. "In many of our most polluting and hazardous industries," Castleman notes, "the existing plants are very old and incapable of being made safe by adding on control devices. They need to be redesigned and rebuilt, not just fitted with exhaust fans. Faced with this reality, some manufacturers find it economically attractive to move hazardous manufacturing plants to less restrictive locales rather than stay where they are and meet tough regulations."

Castleman reported, for example, that before 1970, 99 per cent of asbestos imports into the United States came from developed countries—Canada, Europe and Japan. In the aftermath of the proven links between asbestos and lung cancers, imports from Mexico, Taiwan and Brazil shot up by over 2 million pounds more than what the US imported from its original sources. During the early '70s American companies began closing down relatively new asbestos yarn mills and establishing plants in Mexico and other Third World countries. And US tariff policies have encouraged such exports. Castleman shows that Mexico, Brazil, Taiwan and South Korea are among the developing nations that recently have been declared 'beneficiary countries' under the generalised system of tariffs on US imports. EDWARD J. BERGIN

Call for Reform

EDWARD J. Bergin, 42, is a senior policy advisor in the US Department of Labour. For the past 11 years, in his role as a top civil servant, he has been involved with a wide range of government programmes dealing with occupational health and safety, mine safety, workers' compensation, and educating workers about hazardous pesticides and chemicals and related environmental dangers in and around factories, workplaces, and communities built around industrial areas.

"Bhopal is a tragic lesson for the entire world, particularly the US," Bergin told INDIA TODAY'S INDERJIT BADHWAR in a lengthy interview in Washington. During the last four years Bergin has emerged as a bitter and outspoken critic of his own government's failure to deal with the widespread danger of chemical pollution. Drawing on his dozen years of experience Bergin has written a fast-selling book—How to Survive in Your Toxic Environment—in which he excoriates several government agencies along with the chemical industry for failing to protect the American public from pollutants in the environment. Excerpts from the interview:

Q. Can it happen here? Can a Bhopal be repeated in America?

A. Chemical companies here try to perpetrate the myth that it can't happen here, that it's always going to happen to the other guy. But in truth, we're living in a chemical nightmare. Because I say this my critics call me apocalyptic. Bhopal simply, and tragically, highlights the problems here.

Q. What is the reality of the nightmare?

A. At any given time 2 million American workers are totally disabled from occupational and environmental diseases. Much of the underground water of the nation is threatened by toxic chemicals that seep in from thousands of abandoned chemical dumps. States throughout the nation are affected by the deadly poison dioxin. The Government recently paid $33 million to buy the dioxin-contaminated homes in one community to relocate them elsewhere.

We heard horror stories about chemical pollution in Love Canal, New York, and about the Valley of the Drums in Kentucky where 100,000 rotting and decaying drums are leaking deadly wastes into the land and streams. And polychlorinated biphenyl (PCB), a dangerous chemical used in electrical equipment has found its way into the tissues of nearly every man, woman and child in the country.

Q. But haven't the really deadly ones like DDT and asbestos been banned?

A. We heard of the people in Triana, Alabama, who were absorbing deadly levels of DDT from contaminated fish. Asbestos was used everywhere and got into our schools, plumbing, and heating ducts and now it's flaking and getting into children's lungs where it can cause lung cancer. Asbestos will claim the lives of about 12,000 Americans a year through the end of the century.

Q. What about drinking water?

A. Some of the drinking water in Long Island and Florida has become contaminated with aldicarb, a pesticide called Temik produced by Union Carbide. The lovely James River in Virginia was banned for a while to commercial fishing because Allied Chemical wanted to make a few dollars selling a pesticide called Kepone that polluted the river.

Q. It looks as if there's a chemical at every turn.

A. It's a big business with more than $113 billion in annual sales. The number of chemicals is staggering—there are food additives, cosmetics, drugs, shampoos, detergents, polishes, carpeting, car seats, clothing, pesticides. An average room in America contains 2,000 man-made chemicals.

Q. Are you saying all chemicals are dangerous? Haven't they contributed to raising standards of living?

A. All chemicals are not dangerous. But it's a good idea to be careful. The attitude of the Government and industry is that chemicals are innocent until proven guilty. What I'm saying is that the burden of proving that chemicals are safe—through adequate testing—should be shifted to the industry.

Q. What do you mean?

A. The sad truth is that there is no toxicity information available on about 78 per cent of all the chemicals that are now in commerce. These chemicals are untested. Industry resists all pressures to do the testing. So we have very little ability to make health hazard assessments. The chemical industry makes guinea-pigs out of gullible consumers.

Q. How much is the Government at fault?

A. Let me cite a specific example. The case of ethylene dibromide (EDB) is pretty well known by now. Residues of EDB were found in food almost 15 years ago. And EDB was found to cause cancer in 1973, more than 10 years ago. But the federal government did not even begin to move against EDB until last year.

Q. But aren't regulations too expensive? Besides, if everything causes cancer, why worry?

A. These are all myths. Chemical companies talk from both sides of their mouths. Whenever the Government tries to regulate a chemical through testing, building in safety devices or cleaning up or controlling pollutants, the industry raises a ruckus and wants us to believe it's too expensive to protect people. Then when the damage is done and people start becoming sick, they argue the other side and say it's too expensive to pay for the victims. In the case of asbestos, the product liability costs from workplace exposure alone has been estimated at over $90 billion—more than the book value of all the companies that made asbestos.

And as for the argument that all chemicals cause cancer so why worry, the blunt truth is that of 3,000 commonly used chemicals that have been tested, only 200 have been shown to cause cancer and other diseases.

Q. Was methyl isocyanate—the Bhopal poison—ever tested?

A. No long-term studies that I have been able to find. But my colleague, Arthur Palotta who is recognised world over as a brilliant toxicologist, believes that the substance is so reactive that it is potentially a mutagen, teratogen and carcinogen.

Q. In any future compensation award, how will Bhopal's victims be compensated for these diseases?

A. That's the whole trouble. The acute, immediate injuries are easily compensible. But we have seen that exposure to dangerous chemicals leads to slow-developing diseases such as birth defects and cancers and neurological disorders that may show up 10 or 20 years after the initial exposure. My suggestion is that all the people in Bhopal exposed to the gas should be placed on a registry and followed up by experts for long-term epidemiological studies. And Union Carbide should be made to deposit a sum of money in an interest-bearing escrow fund from which victims on the registry who fall prey to cancers and nerve diseases 10, 15 or 20 years from now should be compensated. And the company ought to bear the costs of the long-term study and care of the people on the registry.

Q. What about the future? What reforms are needed?

A. Chemical companies must be required to make pre-marketing tests of their products and to test the ones already on the market. Reforms would include improvement in the rights of victims, changes in product liability laws that will permit people to sue chemical companies immediately if they impose unreasonable risk on society.

"The attitude of the US Government and industry is that chemicals are innocent until proven guilty. I'm saying the burden of proving chemicals are safe should be shifted to the industry."

these countries enter the US duty-free and the standard 4 per cent is charged for the rest.

The United States has also sharply increased its import of benzydine dyes after major domestic manufacturing plants began closing down during the mid-1970s because of long-term health hazards. The imports into the US are now mainly from Romania, Poland and India.

Vincent A. Gallagher, a US Government health official who investigated conditions in runaway shops in Latin America came away horrified. He made a report to the US Labour Department in which he noted: "In one mine 74 per cent of the miners on the payroll were suffering from silicosis. No dust suppression equipment is used in these mines. In one Central American country it was found that the nursing milk of the mothers who lived in the cotton growing regions contained between six and 200 times the amount of DDT permissible according to WHO standards." And there is evidence of US complicity in sending pesticides that are banned in the US to other countries. The US Agency for International Development (USAID) has played a willing role in this. Leptophos, a Velsicol chemical product that is known to cause nerve damage and even deaths was shipped by the tons by USAID under economic assistance programmes to Indonesia and other countries. Other US-banned pesticides—heptachlor, chlordane and DDT—were also shipped under USAID auspices to developing countries.

Some other cases documented by Castleman:

► Asbestos. After strict regulations imposed in the US on the production of asbestos, American companies began exporting their factories. Abex Corporation, a US subsidiary of Imperial Chemical Industries "built an asbestos friction products plant in Madras. In 1976 the plant was covered by over $1 million in political risk insurance by the Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC), an agency of the US Government whose mission is to promote needed US industrial investment in developing nations. OPIC made no effort to obtain an accounting of measures that would be taken to protect workers in the design and operation of the plant. Abex replied to OPIC's perfunctory question on ecological effects by simply saying: 'The company will comply with government regulations regarding wastage disposal'."

"Our safety standards in the US are identical to those in India, Brazil or someplace else. Same equipment, same design, same everything."

WARREN ANDERSON
chairman, Union Carbide

► Arsenic and Refined Copper. Epidemiologists at the National Cancer Institute reported that mortality from lung cancer in US communities with copper, lead and zinc smelting was significantly higher than in other areas and concluded that arsenic air pollution was a contributing cause to the high cancer rate. The US Government set tough standards to lower the workplace limit for airborne arsenic exposure. Leading companies such as Asarco and Lepanto, as well as mining companies like Amax have begun shifting operations to the Philippines, Mexico and Namibia. The Namibia operation supplied 8 per cent of the US arsenic imports in 1976. That same year, one-third of US imports of refined copper came from Zambia.

► Mercury. The substance was designated an air pollutant in the US in 1971. The number of mines producing mercury in the US plunged from 109 to four. And the US began importing more from countries like Algeria, Yugoslavia and France.

► Lead Smelters and Battery Plants. Studies have shown lead poisoning among children of lead-exposed workers caused by dust contamination brought home by worker's clothes and shoes. The Center for Disease Control also cited lead smelters' air pollution as a cause of neurophysiological damage in children. The US Government is contemplating imposing stringent control for lead air pollution and the industry is threatening to take its jobs and operations elsewhere.

► Vinyl Chloride Industries. In the mid-1970s reports surfaced linking vinyl chloride with liver cancers in workers exposed to the gas. But despite predictions that tough new government regulations on workplace and pollution controls would wipe out the industry, the manufacturers for the most part complied with the new regulations and somehow survived the financial burdens of these changes.

During the last several years human and animal data have pointed to the carcinogenecity of chromates, chloroform, trichloroethylene, benzene, acrylonitrile, cutting oils, 2-nitropropane, phenylmethane, ethylene dibromide, berylium and cadmium. The US Labour Department has also issued emergency standards for lowering the workplace exposure to workers of benzene to no more than two parts per million.

Castleman calls for a major worldwide thrust to combat these problems. All nations, he says, need to develop expertise in toxic substances control to protect their people from the time that new industrial projects are planned, as well as later, in the course of their operation. "Unfortunately, few nations have so far set up regulatory agencies with sufficient resources, expertise, and authority to provide much protection to workers and communities from the dangers of operating plants." He recommends that an international organisation should organise a "hazard information export service that would disseminate current knowledge about health risks and their control; assist interested governments and affected individuals in appraising industrial project plans and setting standards; gather and distribute knowledge about the movements of hazardous industries around the world; and keep track of other aspects of hazard export, primarily movements of banned foods, drugs, consumer products and pesticides to other nations from the nation where they were banned."

The main objection to the idea of preventing hazard export is the argument

CC-0. In Public Domain. Gurukul Kangri Collection, Haridwar

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

that poor people are better off with hazardous factories and goods than they would be without them, and their governments ought to be able to assess the risks and make their own choices.

The notion that hazard export with informed consent is a legitimate way to do business raises disturbing questions. Castleman says: "What's at stake may be the destruction of the environment's capacity to bring forth food that is not poisoned, and a starving man might accept a polluting factory even at great peril to future generations of man and other living things the world over. And might the hazard exporters offer the poor man more if the course of hazard export was barred?"

UNION CARBIDE

Same Danger

AN INVESTIGATIVE committee of the United States Congress which began an emergency investigation into the safety of chemical plants following the Bhopal tragedy has reached a preliminary conclusion that the safety and physical features of a Union Carbide plant that manufactures methyl isocyanate in Institute, West Virginia, are identical to those in Bhopal.

The conclusion has raised the alarm that if the two plants are indeed identical, then there is a very real possibility of a Bhopal-type disaster occurring here as well. In preparation for the investigation Union Carbide was forced to close down a production line in its West Virginia plant that produced the deadly gas.

Warren Anderson, chairman of the board of Union Carbide, stressed repeatedly before formal Congressional hearings in Institute, that "our safety standards in the US are identical to those in India, Brazil or some place else."

The investigation, spearheaded by Representative Henry Waxman of California, has made it clear that Carbide's safety standards—globally identical though they might be—are far from adequate. An investigative staff memo made available to INDIA TODAY by aides to Waxman stated bluntly: "Our interviews with (the West Virginia) plant and state officials only seemed to confirm that both sets of officials seemed to have little knowledge and control over the very toxic processes that they oversee."

Plant records revealed the startling fact that 12 pounds of methyl isocyanate had been leaking from the plant into the community every hour. The staff memo noted: "Yet this system is supposed to be closed without any openings to the atmosphere that aren't first vented through a scrubber or flare stack. State officials didn't have the faintest idea where the leak was coming from within the plant."

Inspection of other plant records offered an even more frightening spectre: these records identify massive leaks of toxic gas which the plant personnel have identified as at least as toxic as methyl isocyanate. For example, 90 pounds of formaldehyde, 22 pounds of chloroform, 40 pounds of acrylonitrate, and two pounds of phosgene were leaking from the plant on an hourly basis.

"You really don't know what you're putting into the air, do you, and what effect it has?", Waxman asked Carbide Chairman Anderson at the open hearing in Institute. Replied Anderson: "Current technology prevents an emission-free plant...but I'm sure there are emissions coming from the plant from time to time that are controllable and are not harmful."

Union Carbide's emergency procedures consist of a system of bells and whistles to alert the community and its workers to catastrophic events such as gas releases. "If there is a gas release," the staff memo said, "citizens are supposed to check the wind direction and if the wind is blowing from the plant toward you, you are supposed to immediately evacuate on foot by going crosswind. This procedure is absurd. The valley is bordered on one side by a river and on the other by a mountain range. According to an aerosol dispersal expert we talked to, if there were a major release only the fleetest would get out alive."

Perry Bryant, a representative of the West Virginia Citizens Action Group, told the visiting Congressional investigators that the Bhopal tragedy was "not a case of 'can it happen here?' It happens here every day. We have experienced an increase in respiratory cancers 25 per cent above the national average."

Donald Wilson, who lives within a mile of the plant, told members of the Congressional committee that he and his son were choked and burned by an emission from the Institute facility some years back. "In the spring of 1975 I stepped out on the patio and entered a nightmare world," he said. He said the effects of the incident—that burned his chest and throat—still linger.

Future Congressional hearings will focus on the important issue of compensation for Third World victims of disasters caused by American companies.

These days the task of choosing a computer is as complex as the number of options the market offers. But you've got a choice: work your way through the maze of product claims or come to the No1: WIPRO. Here's the case of a leading soft drink manufacturer who made the right choice...

The challenge: Account-wise analysis of expenditure by cost centres, age-wise analysis of outstandings and financial control reports on cash and fund flow, in addition to everyday book-keeping.

The solution: WIPRO's customized, totally integrated Financial Accounting Package to run on a powerful WIPRO mini-computer.

The outcome: The WIPRO solution maximised the working efficiencies of Financial Planning, Purchase, Production and Sales departments. Monitoring the accounting process to maintain total control over payables and receivables, minimising working capital and reducing interest costs.

If your problem was as complex as this, wouldn't you be concerned about the right move, too?

Break away to the No 1 in mini-computers. In 1983-84, with almost twice the sales of No 2, WIPRO captured 30% of the market in mini-computers. An achievement confirmed in a survey by Data Quest*, where WIPRO emerged as the undisputed leader.

And what's behind WIPRO's No 1 position?

WIPRO's support service. WIPRO can offer customer services countrywide, through a well-planned network of offices. Backed by a qualified and experienced team of hardware and software specialists and service engineers.

WIPRO's customer interaction. A close working relationship with users helps WIPRO develop customized solutions.

WIPRO's product range. Today WIPRO has the widest range of mini-computers with features such as upgradability to meet a user's growing needs. The software developed by WIPRO is compatible across the entire range of its systems.

WIPRO's R&D. Complementing the state-of-the-art inputs in WIPRO's R&D environment is a team of experienced, qualified and dedicated personnel. Helping pioneer and develop systems with the leading edge of technology.

WIPRO's modern factory. WIPRO's factory in Mysore has the most modern manufacturing and testing equipment. The Fairchild ATE, for example—the only one of its kind in India.

THE GOVERNMENT

The New Politics

WITH the advent of 1985, India has entered the age of New Politics. At the helm is a young prime minister representing the generation born on the eve of, and immediately after, Independence; his council of ministers has more young people than any previous one, and the Lok Sabha in which he enjoys an unprecedented majority is overwhelmingly composed of men and women below the age of 45. As the medium is the message, so is political style the political leader. Rajiv Gandhi has suddenly changed the political climate of India from one of protracted combat and confrontation to another of quiet conciliation. His modest, calm and self-confident bearing, the soft language of his politics, the cleansing process that he has unobtrusively set in, the subtle skills of management of power that is manifest in his craft of ministry-making: all this amounts to the silent inauguration of a new chapter in India's political life.

For ten years, beginning with the Jayaprakash Narayan-led people's movement against Indira Gandhi in 1974, India carried an overload of political conflict, combat and confrontation both at the national and local levels. First Assam and then Punjab allowed a flood-tide of violence to gush into the political process. The Centre's handling of political issues in Sikkim, Kashmir and Andhra Pradesh amounted to trampling on the dignity and self-respect of politically conscious and mobilised local elites. Now, at last, the country's political climate is suddenly relaxed for the first time in a decade. The opposition parties, benumbed by the pitiless rejection by the electorate, have stopped hurtling invectives at the ruling Congress(I). The young prime minister has not allowed the spectacular victory to go to his head. He has spoken of his desire to seek the cooperation of the opposition parties in solving national issues.

Rajiv Gandhi's two greatest assets are the massive positive mandate he has received from the national electorate, and the autonomy of his political stature and office. Indira Gandhi was made prime minister by the Syndicate in January 1966. Rajiv Gandhi owes nothing to any organised interest or caucus. The brutal assassination of Indira Gandhi and his own self-confident visage that was watched for hours by 90 million people on the television screen on the day of the funeral, have won him the support and confidence of the vast majority of his countrymen. The vote was an unmistakable assertion of Indian nationalism by all segments of the population all over the country, including the minorities. Since the electoral verdict became known, Rajiv Gandhi has shown that he knows history has cast him in the role of an usherer of change. Above all, change in the morals and behaviour of people in power. He has made his first moves towards creating a new political morality by discarding people who had become, in the public eye, symbols of political amorality and arbitrary use of power, by leashing potentially ambitious men with demanding ministerial jobs and neutralising others, and by initiating on a soft moderate note, a new politics of conciliation and accommodation.

As the medium is the message, so is political style the political leader. Rajiv Gandhi has suddenly changed the political climate of India from one of confrontation to conciliation.

The response in India from political parties and the intellectual community has been hearteningly positive. And, it would seem, from the outside world too. The rumbustious Khalistanis in the foreign countries have retreated into silence. In the United States, Canada and West Germany, governments have made it known that they would not permit suspected Khalistanis to enter their territories. Even Pakistan seems to have realised that it had overreached itself by extending support and assistance to Khalistanis. When the plane carrying Jasbir Singh from Dubai to Manila touched down at Karachi, he was not allowed to leave the aircraft. The world has taken note of the change in India. It is no longer a country in which the rulers are pitted against large segments of the ruled. The powers have suddenly become very cautious about playing with India's internal schisms and conflicts.

The caution may not last if the prime minister does not build on the mandate he has received. He cannot be unaware of the fact that one-half of the electorate voted against his party. That in the three states in which the people nursed strong grievances against the Centre's cavalier treatment of their local identities and aspirations, his party was rejected by a majority. That the massive majority his party enjoys in the Lok Sabha does not mirror the actual political alignments in the country. That if the Opposition barely exists in the Lok Sabha, it exists very much in the political life of India. And that the electorate is as capable of delivering a stunning rejection vote as it is an astonishingly positive verdict.

Rajiv Gandhi therefore has to unfold steadily the grammar and syntax of his New Politics, marshalling the words and idioms of change to write a new prose of political and social democracy. Rapid politicisation of the masses has intolerably increased the demand load on the political system. There is an urge for autonomy of the units of the Union, for self-government at the local layers of the polity. It is necessary to diminish the demand loads on the Union as well as on the states. This can be done only by expanding the resource base and the functional reach of the states and by building a constitutionally-sanctioned infrastructure of local self-government.

Rajiv Gandhi can, if he wishes, create a dynamic and enduring national constituency for himself and his party if he enforces long-delayed structural changes in the political system which would vastly expand its adoptive and accommodative strength. He has to fill the big void in India's political democracy, adopt the legitimate political demands of the emergent local elites, design institutional mechanisms for recruitment and training of political cadres, and defer to the right of political parties to govern in the states where they may be elected to office in clear unmistakable electoral verdicts. Only on a sound and healthy political system can he mount his campaign for modernisation and efficiency and a renewal of political morality.

PLANTING PALMS

HINDUSTAN Lever is getting ready to work out a project for palm tree plantations. The idea grew out of the successful plantations that Unilever runs in Malaysia, and from which the company exports palm oil to England. In India, Lever is looking at sites in some of the southern states, in Assam and in the isolated Andaman and Nicobar Islands. The company would like to invest a large sum of money in the proposed plantation but the project is still in its preliminary stages and no final decisions have been taken. However, several paper manufacturing companies have been trying for some years now to acquire large wood plantations on a lease basis, but with little luck because of local political opposition. It now remains to be seen whether Hindustan Lever will meet with better luck.

SMOKED OUT

THE GENERAL Insurance Corporation of India (GIC) has suffered a loss on its underwriting business for the first time in its 12-year history. The loss of Rs 10 crore during 1984 is due primarily to the insurance claims put in by the owners of vehicles that went up in flames during the communal riots following Mrs Gandhi's assassination. The claims as a result of this totalled a staggering Rs 20 crore.

However, GIC and its four subsidiaries managed to make an overall profit on their total operations, helped by earnings of Rs 100 crore on investments.

MIXED GRILL

THE EMBATTLED Nanda family, which controls Escorts Ltd, seems intent on diversifying into other businesses. Three years ago, Escorts President Rajan Nanda's wife Ritu Nanda successfully launched Niky Tasha as a frontline producer of kitchen equipment and later television sets. Now it is the turn of Anil Nanda, Escorts joint managing director, to start in a big way a series of fast food outlets in different parts of Delhi, called "AN's Hott-Potatos".

Escorts itself has had mixed luck last year. The company's turnover rose 18 per cent to Rs 330 crore, but profits dipped sharply by 26 per cent, to Rs 13.1 crore. This was primarily because of a loss of Rs 4.5 crore suffered on account of the troubled dry dock project and a further loss of Rs 2 crore incurred as a result of a long lock-out at the company's Bangalore plant.

ADMAN COMETH

IT IS boom time for advertising agencies in Kerala, especially those with ministerial connections. People connected with state ministers have floated new agencies and promptly grabbed a series of accounts from state government corporations. One case is that of Leno Jacob, son of the state's Agriculture Minister A.L. Jacob, who has promoted Guide Advertising and grabbed the accounts of the Coconut Development Board, the Milk Marketing Federation, the Agro-Industries Plantation Corporation, Oil Palm India Ltd and the Kerala State Warehousing Corporation. These and other similar developments have provoked an established advertising agency chief in the state (M.E. Cheriyan of Waves) to protest to the state governor. But Cheriyan was quickly blacklisted by government agencies, and barred from the largesse while the new ministerial agencies continue to prosper.

SECOND THOUGHTS

THE GREAT rush into telecommunications seems to have been premature, after all. After announcing some months ago that private sector participation would be welcomed in this field, reserved till then for the public sector, the Government seems to have developed second thoughts on the subject. The current thinking is once again to keep the all-important field of switching equipment reserved for the public sector. As for subscriber-end installations like telephone instruments and telex machines, the Government now argues that these should be manufactured by four state electronic corporations, and private sector entrants should join hands with the state corporations. The technology is to come from abroad. Four European firms have been shortlisted for the purpose: one French, one Italian, and two German. Two of these will eventually be chosen, each of which will then be asked to tie up with two state corporations. Clearly, the great telecommunication boom does not seem ready to materialise just now, and some of the biggest industrialists and business men of the country who had hoped to jump on the bandwagon are going to find themselves sorely disappointed.

FASTER BUCKS

THE RESERVE Bank warning on the falling profitability of banks is timely. The figures show that the 20 nationalised banks saw total earnings rise by an annual average of 22.6 per cent since 1980, but profits rose by an average of only 18.1 per cent annually. The State Bank group, similarly, saw earnings rise annually by 26.3 per cent but profits rose by only 22.2 per cent. In sharp contrast, the foreign banks operating in India have seen profits rise faster than earnings, the respective figures being 31.1 per cent and 17.2 per cent. In fact, the foreign banks made a profit of Rs 17.01 crore on earnings of just Rs 261.93 crore during 1982, while the 20 nationalised banks made a profit of only Rs 37.3 crore on earnings of as much as Rs 3,676.6 crore. Clearly, the domestic banks' profit margins are razor-thin, with little cushion left for unexpected setbacks.

PLANNING

The Versus Complex

THE BEST way of running a government—in fact, the only way, in a democracy—is to find out what people want and give it to them. This is also the best way to run an economy. Growth, planning, trade, foreign exchange and so on are just abstractions. What ultimately counts is whether those at the end of the long pipeline receive what they are supposed to, and what they do get is more or less in line with their expectations.

The prime minister must be inundated with advice from all and sundry but he is evidently a young man who knows his mind and needs nobody's help in making it up for him. There is, however, just one tiny bit of advice, or suggestion, that he should heed. Indian society has developed over the last couple of decades a number of complexes, of which perhaps the strongest and the most virulent is the versus complex. We are apparently unable to perceive things except in opposition to each other: public sector versus private sector, large industry versus small industry, urban sector versus rural sector etc. This may be good politics but it is certainly not good economics. If Rajiv Gandhi can help the country shed this versus complex, he will have done more for the economy than all the economists.

Let us start with the planning process itself. It is not clear why this should be the sole preserve of the Establishment. The new team in the Planning Commission consists entirely of persons who are either government officials or have been very closely associated with the official machinery of the Government. Since the prime minister is so keen on opening up the economy—his own words—he could have made a start by bringing in people from outside, particularly from private industry, which now has a wealth of planning and technical talent. The involvement of men from the private sector at the highest level would have cleansed the Yojana Bhavan of that air of fustiness that hangs about it.

On the public sector issue, the prime minister has said the right things, but this is not the first time they have been said. The public sector has indeed been a tool of development but the tool is now blunted and the giant machinery in which more than Rs30,000 crore have been sunk has nearly ground to a financial halt. The reformation of state undertakings should be the first priority for an administration that sets such big store by efficiency.

For years, the Heavy Engineering Corporation at Ranchi has contributed virtually nothing to development, including its own, and absorbs public funds like a sponge. A few hundred miles away in Kansabahal in Orissa, a private sector company has been doing wonders with its own heavy engineering works. There are, of course, vested interests which may and almost certainly do come in the way of bringing the two sectors together and harmonising their working in such a way as to maximise production and financial returns. However, if the Government can take over sick units in the private sector, there is no reason why sick units in the public sector cannot be handed over to private industry or co-managed jointly by both. There are private industry directors on the boards of state undertakings but their contribution is nominal. What is required is a more deliberate mixing of two cultures, the public sector culture which is essentially procedure-based and the private sector culture which is result-oriented. An administration committed to results can hardly shy away from the latter.

> What is required is a more deliberate mixing of two cultures, the public sector culture which is essentially procedure-based and the private sector culture which is result-oriented.

The versus complex that affects the Government's attitude towards large industry is even more insidious. It is not clear why large industry should be seen as enemy number one of the socialistic pattern of society. A well-run large industry in the private sector is a far better tool of development than a state undertaking as it raises its own resources and is not a charge on the public exchequer. Yet while the chairman of a state undertaking can walk into a ministry and come away with mounds of cash, his counterpart in private industry has to wait his turn for months, even years, for his licences to come through. Rajiv Gandhi has done well to assure the private sector that it will now be allowed into areas otherwise closed to it.

But he might go a step further and ask himself whether the distinction between the two sectors, perhaps necessary at one time due to historical reasons, has not now outlived its usefulness and whether the entire industrial sector, including the portions under the Government's charge, should not be set free so that it can settle down in a new pattern that can bring out the best in both. A start could be made by asking state undertakings to raise their resources in the open market, not by borrowing from banks which are also state undertakings, but directly from the public through the sale of equity shares. The public sector now is insulated from the market and is not responsive to it.

Rajiv is a cautious man and is not interested in change for the sake of change. The elections have proved, if they have proved anything at all, that the people have by and large accepted the system as it is, though they want it to be made more productive. But how do you make the system more productive unless you know what to produce? The only way to know what to produce is to expose it to the market and let it decide what it should and should not do.

This is why we should begin at the planning process itself, which should be more exposed to the public view and should not be the incestuous affair it has become. It is also not necessary for the plans to be so comprehensive and all-embracing, the figures drawn up to the last decimal point. India is changing and changing rapidly and a lot of flexibility should be built into the plans so that they do not become too rigid to conform to the changing requirements of the economy. Let the planners concentrate on a few areas and leave the rest to find their own place and their own level. If the people can sink petty differences like caste, class and religion and vote en masse on a national issue, the Government could take a cue from them and rise above the versus complex on national economic issues also.

INDUSTRIAL SAFETY

Belated Awakening

AS THE devastating implications of the accident at Union Carbide India Ltd's Bhopal plant rocked the nation last fortnight, the spotlight swung to other industrial plants. In the glare of public attention, at least three cases of gas leakages that might have otherwise escaped unnoticed hit the headlines. In Gujarat, ammonia and other gases leaked from Gufie Chemicals, a pharmaceuticals unit. The gases irritated the eyes of residents of the neighbourhood and the state pollution control board ordered the plant shut down till scrubbers and other equipment are installed. Similarly, gas leakages from Fine Chemicals, an alcohol distilling unit, led the Gujarat pollution control board to order the plant out of the residential area it is located in.

And, at the Madura Coats thread factory at Koratti in Kerala, hydrochloric acid that was being unloaded from a tanker spilled into a drain containing unwashed bleach sediment, producing chlorine. The chlorine was swept by the wind into an area where workers had assembled to collect pay packets. Forty-five people had to be hospitalised "as a matter of abundant caution", says K. Sukumar, finance director of Coats. He adds that steps have been taken to separate the unloading and waste disposal of hydrochloric acid and bleach liquor and normal work has resumed at the mill.

The three accidents together showed that the hazards are more widespread than popularly believed, and heightened the need for greater government policing of industry. And last fortnight evidence was piling up of official concern on the issue of industrial safety. State governments formed committees to investigate plant safety, hazardous factories were closed, laws were reviewed and some concrete suggestions were put up.

But for all that, it was not quite clear how decisively officialdom would change track. An Industry Ministry official argued that there were any number of laws on pollution and safety—the Factories Act, the Boiler Act, the Indian Explosives Act, the Indian Electricity Act, the Pesticides Act, the Air (Prevention & Control of Pollution) Act and the Water (Prevention & Control of Pollution) Act. "Where things go wrong is in the implementation of the laws." And a senior bureaucrat working in the Chemicals and Fertilisers Ministry pointed out that an examination of the laws and agencies responsible for monitoring industry and the environment had till now "shown no major gaps".

Still, all of officialdom did not share that view. A working group headed by the director-general factory advise services and labour institutes (DGFASLI) met in Bombay early this month and recommended sweeping legal and penal changes designed to improve safety at the plant level. The group suggested that the Factories Act be amended to define the occupier of a factory as the head of the organisation, instead of lower level functionaries. Thus the blame for non-compliance with safety regulations will be pinned on managing partners or managing directors of companies. Secondly, it recommended that environment committees be set up in each state entrusted with the power to clear industrial projects for safety before they are sanctioned. Thirdly, it said that equipment manufacturers should be held responsible for accidents arising from equipment failures. Fourthly, the panel suggested that the maximum fine for violating safety standards be raised from Rs 2,000 or three months imprisonment or both to Rs 5,000 or three months' imprisonment.

More specific steps were taken at the national level. An inter-ministerial joint task force that has been looking into the whole gamut of environmental and safety rules in the statute books for months was told last fortnight to speedily hand in its report. Stock was taken of toxic substances manufactured domestically or imported, and the Ministry of Environment and Forests recommended that official reports on whether safeguards are being built in while industrial plants are being set up should be sent to it for assessment and approval.

Action was contemplated in other areas: fresh legislation on handling dangerous chemicals and a spanking new agency staffed with technical highfliers to oversee in-plant implementation of laws.

The Bhopal accident had clearly galvanised state and local governments too. In the Union territory of Delhi, Director of Industries B.P. Misra shot off a request to the Central Air & Water Pollution Control Board to recheck the possibility of gas leakages at the public sector Hindustan Insecticides Ltd (HIL) and Sriram Food & Fertiliser plants.

Gujarat's pollution control board went one better. It ordered the 14 plants that produce pesticides and pesticide raw materials in the state to close down pending a review of on-site factory precautionary measures, relenting in the case of two companies after they handed in written assurances that they would take the action desired. In a bit of me-tooism, Maharashtra and West Bengal quickly followed suit by directing their pollution control boards to identify and study the safety standards of all potentially dangerous factories.

Companies on their part, buffeted by the shock waves of Bhopal, sought higher "public liability" insurance covers of up to Rs 2 crore each, stepped up the frequency of safety drills and, in at least one case, decided to up investment in safety precautions. Says H.S. Behl, secretary of the 90-member Pesticides Association of India: "We have advised our members to review safety procedures." Adds S.P. Dua, managing director of HIL: "Our company has increased its budget for safety."

Despite industry introspection, scepticism was expressed as to whether it would amount to much. "There is a lot of complacency in this country on industrial safety," warns Dinesh Abrol, secretary of the Delhi Science Forum, a watchdog body of scientists. Mounting nationwide evidence supports that observation. A broad spectrum of industries are disingenuously oblivious to the dangers to human life posed by their operations, even fairly well-regulated ones like the petrochemical idustry.

Refineries dispose of toxic wastes irresponsibly, those in the populated Chembur area of Bombay being the worst offenders. Their crude oil tanks are cleaned once in two or three years and the sludge removed from the bottom is allowed to flow into lagoons, technically called "weathering pits". The sludge cannot legally be sold because it can be used as an adulterant in petrol. One engineer describes these lagoons as "time bombs" because they are open and a spark alighting on them could send the whole complex into flames.

Says Anil Deshpande, manager of Enviro Systems, the division of Thermax Pvt Ltd that deals with waste treatment, "The best way to get rid of toxic waste is to burn it." This involves dumping the waste in a furnace which continuously burns oil at a temperature of 1000 degrees Centigrade. But only a handful of companies in the country have incinerators chiefly because installing them calls for a chunky investment of up to Rs 3 crore. "This sort of technology is viable only if there are paybacks in the form of reusable chemicals," says Thermax chairman Rohinton Aga.

Thus one pesticide manufacturer was most reluctant to buy an incinerator for a plant at Ankleshwar, Gujarat, but had to do so on the urging of the state pollution control board. The refineries themselves, especially the seven public sector ones built in the '60s or earlier, are vulnerable to fire. Fire-fighting facilities in the seven public sector refineries need to be checked, a public sector petro-chemical plant designer points out in warning.

Management and instrumentation failures and poor plant layout can compound hazards, notes an unreleased government document that examined the causes of the fire and explosion at the Cochin refinery last March. Even the newer refineries are not exempt from the possibility of explosions occuring. An officially sponsored assessment of safety measures at the Mathura refinery in Uttar Pradesh does not rule out a vapour cloud explosion at Mathura following the catalytic reactor or the gas and liquid hydrocarbon-filled atmospheric distillation unit rupturing. The vapour cloud could be carried by winds to heavily populated areas.

THE PRIVATE sector is equally guilty of negligence on the safety front. At times even elementary precautions are not adopted. Official reports on fires that broke out in April 1983 at a cotton ginning factory owned by the Kotharis at Adoni, Andhra Pradesh, and at Fabina Textiles Pvt Ltd in Bhiwandi, Maharashtra, last March note that the fire was mainly aggravated by the absence of adequate water supply facilities in the former case and by the lack of fire-fighting equipment such as hydrants or sprinklers in the latter. And in petrochemical complexes, where megadisasters can occur, private companies at times scrimp on safety devices to cut costs. "They bargain with the foreign licenser to cut costs and safety gets the go-by," says the plant design engineer.

A manufacturer who supplies equipment to HIL questions the assumption that the public sector's track record is vastly better. "No HIL inspector has come to our factory to see equipment tested before his eyes," he says. Manmohan Singh, chairman and managing director of Frick India Ltd which manufactures industrial cooling equipment, advances a number of explanations for the precipitously low safety standards in industry. First, Indian industry regards human life as cheap. "We all think this. Nobody wants to say it," Singh says candidly. Secondly, companies do not replace parts periodically but wait till they can no longer be used.

Charts by B.K. SHARMA

Abrol of the Delhi Science Forum observes that Indian plants are not designed with enough back-up safety systems. Others in industry point to corruption in the factories inspectorate, the government arm that is supposed to check on safety at the factory level. A manufacturer confesses that he bribed a boiler inspector Rs 5,000 after the inspector said that the boiler's tube outlet for steam should have been stamped "boiler quality tested". The newly set up plant could not go on stream because the boiler had not been certified by the factories inspectorate.

The factories inspectorate in at least one state is undermanned and in a mess. At least half the 11,200 factories in Karnataka were not inspected for safety by state factory inspectors last year. Each of the 21 enforcing officers is supposed to supervise 533 factories annually, but their diaries reveal that only 10 to 15 of the monthly target of 30 factories are actually visited. The growth in inspectorate staff has lagged far behind the growth in the number of factories in the state. In 1962 there were only nine inspectors for 2,416 factories. Fifteen years later, just five more inspectors were added to police 8,614 factories. By last year, another seven were added to oversee 2,586 more factories. With no telephones, department vehicles or status (a factory inspector is on the same rung as a junior engineer), the department is in a shambles, says M.J. Surendra Kumar, chief inspector of factories and boilers in Karnataka.

While Kumar estimates that there should be at least 1,000 prosecutions annually in the state, only 121 offenders were actually prosecuted last year, and 116 the year before. "The fines are so low that managements smilingly pay them and go back and commit the same offence," he says.

Not surprisingly, factory accident figures have been spiralling from 5,289 in 1962 to 18,563 last year. Companies are lax in the main about safety, and most have no contingency plans for evacuation of residents who live near plants that process or manufacture dangerous products.

Plainly, unless many-layered idiot-proof safety devices are built into plants and the Government tightens its policing of the corporate sector, Bhopal-type tragedies can and will happen again, the present brouhaha notwithstanding.

BIOTECHNOLOGY

Revolution in the Making

A PLANT growth nutrient that almost doubles some vegetable yields. Coconut trees that grow more than 10 times the number of nuts that trees now produce. Insecticides that are not harmful to humans, unlike the insect killers now on the market. Fats from molasses and even straw. Super pure drugs that are easier, cheaper and far less polluting to manufacture. Vastly increased milk yields that take the wind out of cows, literally.

Hyperbole and castles in the air? Not really. For these are some of the more dramatic products of a coming revolution: biotechnology.

These first stirrings in a frontier industry are being helped along by a massive government investment programme that will see a seven to tenfold step up from the current spending level of Rs 8 crore. The National Biotechnology Board (NBTB) has asked the Planning Commission for between Rs 300 crore and Rs 500 crore for the Seventh Five-Year Plan. On the anvil are germ plasm banks, post-graduate courses in 11 universities to turn out some 200 biotechnologists every year, and a new information system.

Private industry is chipping in with its own effort. Tata Oil Mills has sunk Rs 12 lakh into a project to produce fats from molasses, being undertaken at the Indian Institute of Technology (IIT), Delhi, and is readying to invest another Rs 50 lakh to Rs 60 lakh in a pilot plant which will be set up this year at Ghaziabad. Max India, promoted by Ranbaxy Laboratories, is slated to launch an intermediate used to manufacture semi-synthetic penicillin. Hoechst Pharmaceuticals is looking into the genetic modification of bacterial strains and is testing a drug called Forskolin for the treatment of glaucoma. Wimco has earmarked an initial budget of Rs 3 crore for a biotechnology programme which will be launched next year in collaboration with Helleshog AB, which will provide the know-how to clone fruit trees and tomatoes with a high solid content. A host of other companies ranging from the public sector Hindustan Antibiotics to the private sector Anil Starch Products and Cadila Laboratories have on their biotech agenda products like enzymes, effluent degrading substances, kits to detect pregnancy, filariasis and jaundice, blood clotting agents, antibiotics for tuberculosis and leprosy, and hormones.

Hindustan Lever, which has sold Rs 1.5 crore worth of its plant growth nutrient over the last year, is working on a range of bio-insecticides aimed at boll worms, mosquitoes and flies, all of which are expected to be on the market in a few years. Lever is also testing out chemicals formed from bio-gas that may control the formation of methane in cows. Says K.K.G. Menon, vice-president of the Hindustan Lever Research Centre: "Fifty per cent of the carbon in cattlefeed goes as methane and only 15 per cent goes into milk production. If you can inhibit the formation of methane, you can raise milk formation."

Some of the projects may still be on paper, and many may fail to make the transition from the laboratory to the marketplace. The Government itself is not entirely happy with industry's response so far. Says S.Ramachandran, adviser to the biotechnology board: "We're talking to major private companies but their response has been lukewarm, and firms are enquiring more about the tax benefits available." But others are more hopeful. "Once the Government takes the lead, the private sector will certainly follow," feels G.M. Chopra, director of Alchemie Research Centre Pvt Ltd, the research company set up by Indian Explosives. Adds a drug manufacturer in Bombay: "When technological development is delivered by the Government on a turnkey basis, industry will jump on the bandwagon."

Certainly, there is no shortage of businessmen who do not want to be left behind if a revolution is coming, and who would therefore like to establish a presence in a greenfield area. Says industrialist L.M. Thapar, whose Ballarpur Industries has a research and development centre for biotechnology at Patiala: "This is a frontier industry and we are feeling our way. We have to be ready to move into it. We will have to buy technology from the West, and will have to know what to shop for."

A catch-all term, biotechnology includes processes such as fermentation and microbial genetics. Fermentation techniques have been known for thousands of years and are used to make bread, wine, and more recently antibiotics. But the science of biotechnology came into its own a decade ago, when ways of tinkering with deoxyribonucleic acid (DNA), the basic building block of life, were discovered. Engineered genes can be put to several industrial uses, to enormous benefit:

▶ Some yeast cells produce lipids or fats. The amount of fats to be produced can be manipulated by synthesising a specific type of protein in the yeast cell with nitrogen and other compounds. The Tata Oil Mills project looks at the viability of producing 'single cell' oil for the production of soaps, fatty acids and edible oils.

▶ Edible oils can be made from rice straw. Tarun Ghose, head of the biochemistry research centre of IIT, estimates that if 40 per cent of the rice straw produced in the country is used to produce lipids or fats, 2.52 million tonnes of lipids can be produced annually—equivalent to the annual edible oil consumption in the country.

▶ Plants can be 'fixed' to use larger quantities of the nitrogen in air so that they require less fertiliser. Work on nitrogen fixing is on the agenda of laboratories under the Indian Council for Agricultural Research.

▶ Microbial polysaccharides (sugars found in bacteria) can be used to separate oil from water, helping to raise yields in oil extraction. Genetic manipulation can help produce more polysaccharides.

▶ Paddy commonly comprises 30 to 40 per cent food, the rest being inedible. Bugs can be engineered to reverse this ratio.

IT'S LIKE a fairy-tale," says a scientist. But the big question is when will all these journey to the market? Industrialists like Parvinder Singh of Ranbaxy Laboratories see the market opening up by the end of this decade. "That is not too long a period considering that manufacturing licences take two to three years to materialise," he observes. Singh sees a Rs 20 crore to Rs 25 crore turnover for Max India's drug intermediate 6-amino penicilanic acid (6-APA) two years hence. By the turn of the century, drugs made from biotech processes will have a total turnover of more than Rs 4,000 crore. Some visualise a Rs 100 crore market for the Hindustan Lever plant growth nutrient a few years from now.

The economics of the business is as attractive as the prospective market size. Max India invested Rs 5 crore in its 60 tonne per day 6-APA project, less than what competitors using old fermentation or chemical techniques put in to make the same product. And apart from the lower investment, there are the advantages of lower energy consumption, higher product purity and no pollution. Lever's Menon in fact argues that bioprocesses can be carried on in a room and that little infrastructure is required. But this is contested by Ramachandran of the biotechnology board, who points out that in some cases firms can wind up with chunky investments if they do their own research and development. But this may be precisely the reason why few companies are in fact doing their own research. Indeed, much of private research and development investment in the field may be nothing more than an effort to gain literacy in the business, so that the company knows what technology to buy from where. Says Ghose of IIT: "Indian industry is reluctant to sink money into Indian biotechnology. So it prefers to import know-how."

Meanwhile, companies see other advantages in choosing to adopt biotechnology, including the possibility of carving out new markets and ensuring raw material supplies. Lever hopes to soon carve out niches for itself in the health and farm products markets with its pregnancy diagnostic kits, its rhizobia to convert nitrogen in the air into nitrogen compounds that legume plants can use, and its tissue culturing of coconut trees, sugarcane and cardamom. A few thousand, and later a million, high-output disease-resistant plantlets will be sold to farmers through nurseries. The company would also like to set up plantations, where the big money lies, says H.C. Srivastava, who heads the agricultural division at the Lever Research Centre.

Both Tata Oil Mills (Tomco) and Wimco are looking ahead and ensuring raw material supplies. Tomco makes animal feeds and soaps from fats, which are scarce. "The biotech process used at IIT would give the company an assured supply of fats," says Tomco's Vice-Chairman K.S. Hinge. Wimco has set its sights on doubling its present processed food exports of 15,000 tonnes a year in five years and has plans to provide farmers with genetically improved plantlets that will sharply raise crop output, notes company Managing Director Kamaljit Singh. Wimco will benefit by sewing up lower priced supplies of more fruits and vegetables for export while the farmers' income will shoot up owing to the larger volumes his land will produce.

With all this on offer, and with so many corporate heavyweights jumping into the fray, the biotech revolution may storm corporate boardrooms sooner than the Cassandras predict.

COMPUTERS

Chip Shop

NOW THAT the bits and bytes are here to stay along with BASIC, ROM and two disc drives, the choice for the user—who probably thinks Pascal was a scientist and that COBOL is the name of a character in Star Trek—can be more than a little confusing. But there's a little help from friends, now: last month the country's first computer department store opened in Bombay. Computer Point is a one-stop shop on the lines of Computer Land of the US, for micro-micros priced up to Rs 1.5 lakh, and stocks everything to make the machines beep: paper, discs, printers, monitors, a limited collection of cassette and disc-based software and bright young things who lead the customer through the maze of computerese.

A dozen Indian computer manufacturing firms have already signed up to get their wares on show and the response can only be described as encouraging: sales even before the shop opened were Rs 5 lakh, and if the half-dozen or so people who wandered in every day and asked to take this printer or that computer home had been allowed to do so, Computer Point would have been able to ring up a hefty amount in the till even before the ribbon was cut on the last day of the year. Says General Manager R. Ramraj: "We want to tap the home computer and small business computer market. We are hoping that the people who can afford cars will come in here."

Of course, people can't just walk away with a computer, because the shop is essentially only a showroom for the machines. Computer Point pays the manufacturer 25 per cent of the price as a deposit, and receives 15 per cent commission on all sales. There is also a hire-purchase plan and a rental service. Says Satish Idgunji, zonal manager of Eiko Sales Pvt Ltd (turnover Rs 2 crore): "Over the next five years, computer sales and use are going to increase in geometric progression. We feel the shop concept should help us to tap bigger and bigger markets."

The interior of Computer Point: pioneering effort

The question mark for the slickly-laid out department store is the new computer policy, which will reportedly slap an import duty of about 200 per cent on computers competing with local products. But even at this rate a Sinclair ZX 81, one of the best beginners' computers in the market, could be available for less than half the Computer Point tab. This computer can be bought abroad for £50 (Rs 750) or even less. With duties added on at even 300 per cent, the machine would cost Rs 3,000 altogether—but at Computer Point, it's on sale at Rs 5,500.

The other question mark is that the manufacturers may not like to display their products in one room, because this could force comparisons and bring prices down. Despite the fancy "we are different" claims, one machine is much like the other, the difference being the software fed into it. In fact, during negotiations with Computer Point, several manufacturers dropped their prices by about 5 per cent. However, a few big manufacturers are coming round to the idea. Which should make for some rather cramped shelves in the store.

SWRAJ PAUL

"No one is above the law"

HE IS a friend of both Pranab Mukherjee and R.K. Dhawan. And he does not have the same equation with Rajiv Gandhi as was the case with Mrs Indira Gandhi. Is Swraj Paul, therefore, out in the cold? And will he now have to plough a more lonely furrow in his battle for getting his Escorts and DCM shares registered?

With his friends thrown out of office and new power centres taking charge in Delhi, there was no shortage of people willing to write off Paul's chances last fortnight. And reports did the rounds about the Government deciding to reopen old cases against him and the Apeejay group in India that his brothers run. But Paul himself remained seemingly unfazed by the sweeping changes in the capital, partly because the Government and the Reserve Bank finally decided to appeal to the Supreme Court against the Bombay High Court judgement in November declaring his investments in the two Indian companies illegal. The long-delayed decision to appeal was apparently cleared by Rajiv Gandhi after the then finance minister Pranab Mukherjee and Attorney General K. Parasaran took the matter up with him in the midst of the election campaign. Meanwhile, Paul was busy renewing contacts and rustling up new friendships, even meeting Rajiv Gandhi.

Paul: no regrets

Senior Editor T.N. NINAN interviewed Paul shortly before he headed back to his London home. Excerpts:

On the new government:

I think they are very determined and they will do a good job. And they are aware of the fact that if they don't produce results people will change their mind.

On the Government and Reserve Bank deciding to appeal to the Supreme Court:

I hope the Supreme Court takes all the relevant aspects of the matter into account.

On the dismissal of Pranab Mukherjee and the resignation of R.K. Dhawan:

No minister should be there for more than five years, because people run out of ideas. And when a minister is appointed, he must also take it that he will go some day.

As for Dhawan, it was a very amicable parting, and I think it was the right thing to do. Dhawan worked for Rajiv's mother for 23 years. Rajiv grew up with him, and you can't command a man with whom you have grown up. Can a personal secretary of mine work for my son? There is a human element here, and the parting has been very pleasant. The prime minister wanted to offer Dhawan some other slot, but Dhawan said he did not want anything.

On how he will be affected by the departures:

Nobody will miss Dhawan in that place more than I will. But I am also the happiest man that he has gone. Also, I don't consider my position weak or strong because of friendship. In the end, your strength is your actions.

On reports that the Government might reopen old cases against him and his brothers:

I hope they do that and find out the truth. I also hope they publish all the reports on everyone else. If Swraj Paul was so weak as to be frightened by government investigations, he would not have taken the stand that he has in the last two years.

On the tasks before the new government:

The first problem is law and order. No one should be above the law. The Government must bring back faith in the people that the law is for everybody, whether it is Swraj Paul or H.P. Nanda.

LARSEN & TOUBRO

Aiming High

IT BEGAN as a one-room trading operation in Bombay's Ballard Estate. Now, half a century later, Larsen and Toubro (L&T) makes products ranging from cement to cement plants, and from earth-moving equipment to compact switchgear. And the once low-profile engineering giant, pushed into the spotlight recently by being voted the "most respected medium-sized company" in the country, is now set to blaze a host of new trails that will treble both its asset base as well as its turnover in just six years. Chairman and President N.M. Desai, who succeeded the legendary founder Henning Holck-Larsen seven years ago, says the company will invest at least Rs 500 crore in fixed assets and boost the turnover from Rs 349 crore last year to over Rs 1,000 crore in 1990. "Profits," says the quiet Desai, "should also be a nice fat figure. We're not going to put our money into anything that is a loss-maker."

The name of the game is and has been diversification, using solidly established manufacturing strength as a base. Thus, for a company which has installed 40 per cent of all the cement plants in the country, what could be more natural than building its own cement plant, an out-size monolith at Awarpur in Maharashtra which already produces 3,200 tonnes of cement a day and which is scheduled to double that in 1987. Other new projects include a heavy engineering workshop at Hazira in Gujarat to build plant equipment, modules for nuclear power plants, heavy water machinery and rocket casings for the country's fast growing space programme. If that underlines the company's already existing presence in areas of sophisticated technology, the company has also recently tied up with Bally of Switzerland for shoe exports and is setting up a plant to manufacture pollution control equipment at the sprawling Powai works in Bombay. Also on the cards is a likely "participation" in the Nagarjuna fertiliser project in Andhra Pradesh and a jack-up oil rig to be leased to the Oil and Natural Gas Commission (ONGC). But one project that has apparently been put in cold storage is a giant tyre unit that would have meant an investment of around Rs 100 crore. If and when all the projects materialise, L&T will be without question the country's leading engineering conglomerate.

Money is required for all this, and L&T will need between Rs 100 crore and Rs 150 crore annually to sustain the expansion. "We have got to the point where we can digest massive expenditure on capital assets," says a senior manager. So the company plans to raise Rs 68.5 crore through a share and debenture issues later this month, apart from drawing on suppliers' credits and foreign currency loans on an unprecedented scale. Despite spending Rs 250 crore on fixed assets in the last three years, the company's debt-equity ratio stands at an enviable 1.7:1.

Making motor casing for a satellite

"The company will invest at least Rs 500 crore in fixed assets and boost the turnover from Rs 349 crore last year to over Rs 1,000 crore in 1990."

N.M. DESAI
chairman & president, Larsen & Toubro

Money should not be a headache for another reason: post-tax profits have been increasing at an annual rate of about 25 per cent over the last five years, and last year totalled a handsome Rs 23.28 crore.

The financial health of the company is one reason why it has been able to absorb shocks like periodic labour strife. Industrial relations have never been L&T's strong point, as even the most loyal of its managers admit, and last year a strike shut down the Kansbahal, Orissa, and Bangalore plants for as much as four months. Curiously, the dispute was not over money—L&T pays some of the highest wages in the industry—but over what Chairman Desai chooses to call "the right of management to maintain discipline on the shop floor".

Another somewhat disconcerting aspect of the company is its tax planning, or the lack of it. At a time when other companies take pleasure in squeezing through loopholes and barricading themselves behind concessions to cut their tax outgo, L&T has been the darling of the taxman. In the six years ending in March 1981, it paid out over Rs 40 crore as tax on profits. In glorious contrast, the Tata Engineering and Locomotive Company coughed up only Rs 91 lakh and the ever-inventive Reliance Textile Industries no more than Rs 25 lakh. However, with the present asset-adding binge and downstream depreciation write-offs, the tax liability of the company might well be reduced soon.

Asset-adding can go too far, however, and the company has reached out into the wide ocean at the wrong time. Its five recently acquired ships (the first two appropriately enough being named Holck-Larsen and Soren Toubro) have been losing heavily. Even the oil rig venture is something of a non-starter because the Government has apparently not given the company the crucial assurance that the rig will indeed be hired.

Desai clearly hopes that in the new climate of go-getting enterprise such setbacks will be temporary. Others certainly think so, especially in Bombay's imposing stock exchange tower (built by L&T's construction group). For, last fortnight the company's Rs 10 share was nudging Rs 80. With the massive expansion plans announced, and the stock-market anticipating a bonus share issue next year, the chip should turn bluer still.

VOLUNTARY RETIREMENT

Trimming the Fat

THEY are picking up scalpels in the south. Nearly a dozen corporations have applied the knife to bloated labour forces over the last one year—and the surgery has been relatively painless. The name of the game is voluntary retirement. And when last fortnight the new management of the Madras-based Gordon Woodroffe announced that those of its employees who chose to bow out would be handed sums of up to Rs 80,000 to ease the pang of parting, it joined a clutch of companies like Premier Mills, E.I.D. Parry, Rallis India, Dunlop India, Wimco, Binny and Company Ltd and Sundaram Clayton that have speeded unwanted employees on their way with generous farewell presents.

South India's business world has clearly seized on a painless and time-saving method of trimming staff strength, easing out unproductive, older workers and other deadwood, and removing obstacles to furthering corporate goals. K.V. Ramachandran, vice-president in charge of personnel at E.I.D. Parry, questions whether Madras-based companies had a professional approach to manpower planning in the past. Explains A.V. Karnik, Gordon Woodroffe's new managing director: "The law in Tamil Nadu says that if a worker comes to work in a factory or establishment regularly for 480 days, he has to be taken in as a confirmed regular employee. This is how the labour force has been growing."

Managements also view fat severance pay offers as an easier way of dispensing with unwanted employees than treading the legally permissible but more time-consuming compulsory retrenchment route, since court cases drag on; they can also pick those they wish to hang on to from the large numbers who inevitably apply for retirement, and—an added bonus—unions cannot kick up a row since the schemes are voluntary. Finally, firms like Parry and Gordon Woodroffe which want to mechanise manufacturing operations and simplify and computerise office procedures view their lengthy employee rolls as obstacles.

Nor are voluntary retirement schemes expensive for companies: Gordon Woodroffe may wind up footing a Rs 68 lakh to Rs 1.02 crore bill, and Parry paid 1,300 departing employees no more than Rs 1.85 crore. "Finding that kind of money is not much of a problem for organisations," says a company executive. Adds a spokesman of the Employers' Federation of Southern India: "The corporate sector has picked up and done better in Tamil Nadu in the last two years. So there was some cash."

Viewed from the other side of the fence, retirement schemes are equally seductive. The prime attraction is the opportunity to obtain relatively big money at one go. Thus Parry workers walked off with sums ranging from Rs 80,000 to Rs 1.25 lakh. Gordon Woodroffe's labour has the option of quitting for Rs 40,000 to Rs 80,000, and Premier Mill employees obtained parting benefits in the Rs 9,000 to Rs 36,000 range. As Woodroffe's Karnik points out: "An average worker earning Rs 1,000 a month at our Pallavaram leather unit will be able to retire with Rs 40,000 (double that if provident fund and gratuity are included), and still get another Rs 500-a-month job in a neighbouring tannery."

Says A. Ganesan, a clerk in Parry who now looks after a chemical plant after his voluntary retirement: "I have invested the money I got in fixed deposits and make more than Rs 2,000 a month as my salary from the chemical plant." Another clerk in Parry has used a part of his golden handshake to add another storey to his house and lives on the rental.

Retirement compensation has varied from 15 to 45 days' wages for every year the employee worked or can work were he to continue in the company, the formula depending on his basic salary and dearness allowance (DA) and varying from company to company. At Parry's Madras office, for example, those whose basic pay and DA totalled less than Rs 1,500 a month received Rs 1,750 for every year put in, subject to a ceiling of Rs 35,000. Similarly, those whose pay packets fell in the Rs 1,500 to Rs 2,000 a month range were paid Rs 2,200 for every year of employment in the company, subject to a maximum of Rs 50,000. Rallis India offered its clerks last year half a month's salary for every year they had worked or for every year that left before normal retirement. And Woodroffe is promising a month's salary in lieu of notice, 15 per cent of the remaining salary that an employee would have earned were he to retire in the normal course, plus provident fund and gratuity.

Employee response to such bait has been gratifying from the management point of view. Premier Mills got rid of almost the entire labour force at its factory near Coimbatore (replacing them with cheaper apprentices), Shaw Wallace last year shed some 200 staffers, Parry weeded out over a third of the 1,180 clerks and lower level staff at its south Indian branches, including all the 22 office-bearers of the E.I.D. Parry Staff Association.

But such corporate slimming exercise have their seamy sides also. Some workers at least have been coerced into putting in their papers. Charges A. Padmanabhan, the new president of the E.I.D. Parry Staff Association: "Every employee who chose to retire did not do so voluntarily. There were threats of transfers and other methods of victimisation such as wage cuts." Woodroffe's Karnik concedes that he would switch from carrots to the big stick if the response to his company's retirement scheme is lukewarm. Said he: "Well, there are other ways of getting rid of people that I may be forced to use. I can terminate the services of some people on medical grounds and so on." Such confessions leave little doubt that many of the voluntary retirements have not been entirely voluntary. But equally obviously the leaders of the Madras corporate world seem now to be set on acquiring for themselves leaner, meaner identities.

ALTHOUGH inflationary forces continued to be held in check, the performance of industry was not very encouraging. Money supply recorded another sharp spurt and bank credit to firms has accelerated. The share market is buoyant.

All data are seasonally adjusted. Current trends are computed on the basis of the last six months data, to which a regression is fitted.

Wholesale Price Index

1970-71 = 100

Current Trend 3.9% p.a.

Wholesale prices rose by nearly 0.2 per cent last fortnight chiefly because of increases in the prices of manufactures.

Industrial Production Index

1970 = 100

Current Trend 4.7% p.a.

Industrial production was up 0.4 per cent in October owing to increases in manufacturing and mining, but the pace is down since September.

Manufacturing Output Index

1970 = 100

Current Trend 5.7% p.a.

Manufacturing output rose by 0.3 per cent in October owing to increases in transport equipment, in food products and chemicals.

Money Supply (M3)

Rs Crore

Current Trend 17.25% p.a.

The rate of money supply accelerated to 0.8 per cent last fortnight, owing to bank credit expansion to the Government and to firms.

Commercial Bank Credit

Rs Crore

Current Trend 17.3% p.a.

Bank credit to firms was up 0.5 per cent in the first half of December, still below trend, but with signs of some speeding up.

Share Price Index

1970-71 = 100

Current Trend 13.4% p.a.

Share prices were buoyant in the first half of December, because of bullish tendencies in tea plantation and transport equipment securities.

Power Generation

Million kwh

Current Trend 3.8% p.a.

Power generation dropped 0.2 per cent in October, owing mainly to shortfalls in nuclear and hydel generation.

Closing Gold Prices

Rs per 10 gms

Current Trend 0.7% p.a.

Bullion prices declined nearly 1 per cent last fortnight in keeping with, but sharper than, the long term downward trend.

THE MARKETS

Budget Brakes

BUDGETS, or rumours about budgets, and share prices do not go together and the announcement by the new Union Finance Minister, V.P. Singh, that the Central budget would be presented as usual on February 28 has made the marketmen think twice about the recent mini-boom following the return of the ruling party to power. Prices are still high but not as high as they would have been had the budget bombshell not struck the market in the midst of its celebrations. For the next six weeks, the market will stick to its usual pattern of ups and downs, mostly downs, until the budget day, and thereafter a great deal will depend on what the taxman bringeth. Singh is not a man to be trifled with and what he bringeth may well be a load of new taxes.

Budget apart, the share market is in good shape and although prices will by and large move in a narrow groove, some scrips should do better than most. Tata Steel, Premier Automobiles and Associated Cement have been very much in the limelight but there were others too, particularly on the Lyons Range, which did much better. Companies like Chloride India and Indian Explosives have put out excellent reports. At the Dalal Street end, Larsen & Toubro has been a star performer, with sales touching Rs 350 crore against slightly over Rs 300 crore last year and gross profit up from Rs 37 crore to Rs 47 crore. There are prospects of a bonus issue next year and the turnover figure might rise to even Rs 1,000 crore in five years.

There are apparently so many bonus issues in the pipeline that one doesn't know where to begin. To start with, there is Ingersoll-Rand which makes compressors and has a long history of steady bonus issues. There is also Raymond Woollen, with a similar history, and Colgate, which is said to be ready with an offer for a rights issue followed by a bonus issue. Other companies in the bonus pipeline are Bajaj Tempo, which on a capital base of slightly over Rs 3 crore is expected to make a profit of about six times that figure, Straw Products, and possibly, Century Rayon.

Nearer home, there is Ranbaxy Laboratories, which is rumoured to have touched a turnover of Rs 50 crore in the accounting year ended December. The company missed a bonus issue last year but cannot avoid it this time. Pharmaceuticals and drugs should be an attractive proposition, for a new policy is said to be on the anvil, whatever that means. In fact, most businessmen are expecting a brand new industrial policy that will do away with some of the irritants in the present policy. But in this country things never really work out the way one expects them to. But the winds of change are favourable for the economy as a whole as well as the corporate sector and the markets have an exciting time ahead of them.

Young victims of branding: overwhelmed by superstition

SAURASHTRA

Scars of Suffering

WHEN Sukhram was born in Rajsamdhiyala village of Rajkot last year, his parents were ecstatic. After six daughters, a son had at last been born. But the little boy cried much too often. His superstitious parents believed that he was ill because he had been cursed by evil spirits, and took him to Devsi Malla, 45, a well-known brander. After a fleeting look at the child, Malla threw a thin piece of iron into a crucible of glowing coals. When it had turned red hot, he jabbed it into the stomach of the three-month-old Sukhram. As the child let out a helpless shriek, the mother respectfully filled Malla's palm with rupee coins and left. Days later, the baby's condition worsened. The raw tender flesh became infected and sepsis set in, which spread to other parts of the body. When it affected his brain, the child died.

RAMESH MENON

"I feel so helpless seeing children die. Can we allow this to continue just because it has social sanction?"

DR MANORAMA MEHTA, superintendent, Government Children's Hospital

Sukhram was just one of the many children to pass through the hands of Malla and die or suffer horrendously in the local Government Children's Hospital. Angered by these unnecessary deaths and the apathy of the local police and district administration who took no action, the hospital's Superintendent Dr Manorama Mehta single-handedly launched a campaign against branding. The normally soft-spoken Mehta dashed off a furious letter to A.P. Bhatt, chief judicial magistrate at Rajkot, describing the inhuman suffering caused to children by branders of Saurashtra. Acting with commendable quickness, Bhatt directed the police to arrest Malla. They did arrest him, only to release him on bail. Tragically, though his example seems to have dampened the activities of other branders, Malla himself was back in action last month. He branded a two-month-old child who was suffering from hydrocele (scrotal swelling due to collection of serous fluid in the testis).

In fact, though numerous children have died after branding—Malla alone was responsible for 72 serious cases in the Children's Hospital—the police have arrested just three branders in the past year. The reason is that in the superstition-ridden region of Saurashtra, branding has social sanction. It is performed as a ritual in every village. For example, in Kalipat village of Rajkot district where Malla lives, 95 per cent of the inhabitants have been branded at some point of their lives. Children proudly bare their stomachs to show off their marks. One of them, Ranabhai, has 32 branding marks on his stomach administered by Malla as a "treatment" for stomach pain. Ranabhai is luckier than most: he survived. Laments Mehta: "I feel so helpless seeing children die. Can we allow this to continue just because it has social sanction?"

RAMESH MENON

"Some children do become serious and die. But don't patients die after being treated by reputed doctors?"

DEVSI MALLA,
a brander

THE CUSTOM of branding took firm root here mainly because of the kind of ignorance that prevails in the backward area of Saurashtra, where literacy is below 30 per cent. But surprisingly enough, even the educated get themselves branded. At Kalipat, Keshubhai, an economics graduate does not hesitate to say that branding should be allowed to continue. In Kherada village in Rajkot district, the sarpanch Karsanbhai himself was found to be branding children. And doctors were shocked to find that a health worker in Paddhari village in Rajkot district had got his child branded. The prevailing myth is that branders are blessed by the gods and have the power to cure. Branding is usually done on the lower and upper abdomen, inner thighs, chest and back. "All kinds of superstitious beliefs make even the educated irrational. Many parents do not take a child to a doctor even if the branding wound becomes septic as they believe that the gods are pleased if the wound becomes septic," explains Shantaben Desai, a social worker at Surendranagar. In many cases barren women surreptitiously branded children believing that if they did so it would please the gods, who would then bless them with a child.

One of the major reasons why branding has caught on is that in most villages in Saurashtra, medical facilities are lacking. "Doctors fleece us when we go to their city clinics. Most of them are not interested in our ailments. Why should we go to them?" asks Anantrai Vyas, a clerk. "At least branders do not demand money." Mehta lays her finger on the nub of the problem when she says: "The only way to get rid of branding is to ensure that excellent health services reach the remote areas and doctors get involved with not just sensitively treating patients but also educating them." This is no easy task as faith in branders is very deeply ingrained. For example, eight months ago, Burra, a six-day-old boy from Vejagam Vajdi was admitted to the Children's Hospital for neonatal septicaemia. A few days later he was discharged but as he kept crying, his mother got him branded. When the child developed sepsis he was rushed to hospital. It was too late. He was just 17 days old when he died.

A few centuries ago when there were no antibiotics or medical facilities, branding was probably introduced with a scientific basis. By branding the skin, the immunological system of the body got stimulated because of the infection caused by the wound. The body then reacted so violently that any minor disease or ailment got cured. The principle was the same as that of immunisation today where less virulent germs are injected in small doses into the body so that the body will be able to build up a resistance to it. Allopathic doctors feel that this could be the only explanation.

"Branding is an ancient science, as acupuncture is a science. It has nothing to do with magical powers."

BACHUBHAI GADHVI

Well-known ancient Indian treatises like the Rig Veda, Atharva Veda and Aryabhishek have mentioned branding as a form of cure for various ailments. These books have detailed chapters on branding. Bachubhai Gadhvi, a prominent tantrik at Wadhwan in Surendranagar points out: "Branding is an ancient Indian science, as acupuncture is a science. But 99 per cent of the branders in Saurashtra do not know the correct technique and have not been able to study it as they cannot even read. The few who are effective have learnt of it from their forefathers. It has nothing to do with magical powers as is being widely believed."

Malla is one of those who learnt the "science" from his forefathers. For the last 400 years, his ancestors have been branding patients, and Malla himself before his arrest treated 150 cases per month on an average. Not surprisingly, many of his "patients", new-born babies, have died helpless, voiceless deaths. His curious justification is: "My family has been branding sick children for the last

INDIAN ECONOMY DURING 1983-84

Achieved 8% growth rate against 1.8% the previous year. Foodgrains production touched new heights; infrastructure and certain key industries registered sustained growth. However high inflation, imperfect demand inhibiting capacity utilisation, industrial sickness due to high taxes, shortages and high cost of electricity persisted.

YOUR COMPANY'S PERFORMANCE : TEXTILES

Textile industry is in the grip of rising costs and recessionary demand for the fourth successive year. Adverse weather in 1983 caused shortfall in cotton production leading to 50% price hike, especially in short and medium staple cotton. Liquidity and working capital problems made manufacture of blended yarn and fabrics infeasible. Poor demand even during festive seasons, strikes and communal disturbances caused curtailment or even stoppage of operations. Our Coimbatore mills faced 50% powercut throughout the year; Adoni experienced 25% cut in the latter half. Shortfall was met through stand-by generators, though at higher costs.

PLANTATIONS

Phenomenal performance with record tea crop due to remunerative prices. Our tea estates harvested 3.09 m kg-36% higher than last year's level. Seventh Plan will see incentives flowing to tea industry, providing excellent long term prospects. With Rs.900 crores outlay, production proposed to be raised to 766 m kg (against Rs.300 crores, 600 m kg respectively in Sixth Plan). Our tea estates implemented statutory labour benefits. Availing Tea Board and NABARD facilities, we are modernising tea factories, undertaking massive infilling and consolidation of fields and establishing permanent, elaborate irrigation to achieve stable high production level. For the benefit of workers' children, a Vocational Training Centre, first of its kind in plantations, started in Waterfall Estate. 1984 Coffee crop - lowest on record. Sale to Quota countries was remunerative, but neutralised by heavy discounts given to non-quota countries and by heavy export duty. Present internal consumption is only one-third of production - it needs strengthening through aggressive propaganda so that reliance on unpredictable export market be minimised. With sophisticated machinery, our Curing Works processed record level coffee, even in a lean year.

FERTILISERS

Favourable weather and reduced prices enabled 12% increase in fertiliser application causing record food production. Our Ennore factory maintained profitability with better turnover of NPK mixtures; produced 33,699 tonnes of SSP despite labour unrest lasting 120 days.

CHEMICALS

Reduced demand and surfeit market supplies forced a set-back in our Chemicals Division eroding into other Divisions' profits. Power rates in Tamil Nadu hiked by 20% and a differential 5p per unit charged on our unit, making it less competitive. I hope both demand and price situations improve gradually. Our expanded plant is equipped with titanium anodes under energy conservation programme.

Our corporate philosophy of diversified expansion continues. Letter of Intent has been received for propylene based chemicals project. It would enable better chlorine utilisation, remunerative prices and stabilized operations.

CURRENT YEAR

Prospects are brighter for Chemicals Division with better offtake and prices for Caustic Soda and for Textiles with falling cotton prices. Tea prices are expected to harden further due to global shortage, higher home consumption.

seven generations. Some do become serious and die. But don't patients die after being treated by reputed doctors?" With this argument he seeks to absolve himself of the blame. Unfortunately, responsible people seem to support this kind of logic. The Kalipal Sarpanch, M.D. Jadeja has gone so far as to demand that the police and the district administration permit Malla to brand as it is an age-old practice.

AND INDEED, though the arrest of Malla scared off some of the quacks operating in the remote backward areas of Saurashtra, it has made no significant impact on the number of cases of branding. Apart from the stubborn faith that the local people have in the efficacy of branding, Mehta has to contend with the scepticism of officials. A senior IPS officer once asked the indefatigable campaigner why she was bent on kicking up so much dust over an issue that had undoubted social sanction. Pulling up his sleeves, he showed her the mark he himself had received from a branding done years ago in his childhood.

In his own house, Limbabhai, a brander, has rows of allopathic drugs for his use. He suffers from lung infection and chest pain. But he dares not brand himself.

What was still stranger was that Rajkot Police Commissioner Hiralal told her quite blandly that he was unaware of this phenomenon, as far as he was aware it didn't occur within the city limits. But Limbabhai, a brander who lives in the heart of Rajkot city has been plying his trade for 20 years now. Buddhiben, a woman, has been branding children for over 50 years in Rajkot. Whatever faith people like the IPS officer, the Kalipat sarpanch or the poor, ignorant villagers of Saurashtra may have in them, the branders themselves evidently have no illusions about their trade. In his own house, Limbabhai has rows upon rows of allopathic drugs for his use. He suffers from a chronic cough, lung infection and chest pain. But he dares not brand himself.

BIHAR

The Rural War

A row of houses in Kaitha-Bigha destroyed by the fire

FOR THE Harijan settlement of Kaitha-Bigha in Bihar's Aurangabad district, it was a bloody start to 1985. On New Year's eve, a police patrol surrounded one of the village huts demanding that the inmates surrender. The inmates refused saying: "We are not criminals, we are social workers and revolutionaries." The angry exchanges were soon punctuated by a hail of bullets that gunned down one of the constables. Immediately thereafter, A.K.Pandey, deputy inspector general of police at Gaya, received an unusual wireless message: "Rush army reinforcements to Kaitha-Bigha with mortars and grenade launchers."

The army was not eventually called but the ensuing battle was bloody enough.By the end of new year's day, 12 people lay dead—10 'extremists' and two policemen—and Kaitha-Bigha itself was little more than a heap of ashes. The killing and destruction of the Harijan hamlet spread terror and panic for miles around and immediately raised agonising questions regarding the age-old and often deadly friction between the landless and the powerful landlord-police nexus.

According to the villagers, at least five of those killed by the police were actually taken alive, paraded before the village and then shot at pointblank range. Though the official version is naturally contrary, more evidence of the "encounter" has not been forthcoming for the simple reason that all the inhabitants of the village who witnessed the entire episode have fled in fear of police reprisals.

But the Kaitha-Bigha incident contains all the classic ingredients of earlier "encounters":caste and social tensions, rural poverty aggravated by the yawning economic disparities (14 big landlords control most of the land in the area) and rising Harijan militancy being fuelled by Naxalite organisations. Locals say that on the evening of December 31, Harijans led by militants belonging to two extremist organisations, the Indian People's Front (IPF) and the Maoist Communist Centre (MCC) had assembled in the village to discuss how to avenge the rape of a Harijan girl by the son of a powerful local landlord. The anger of the Harijans was further aroused by a similar incident in which another girl from the village, Satia, daughter of Nanku Ram, had been kidnapped and brutally raped by the son of another landlord. The villagers say that when the landlord clique failed to prevent the Harijans from holding the meeting they sent a messenger to the Obra police station with the warning that "armed extremists were planning to annihilate landlords".

Other eyewitness accounts claim that during the "encounter" that followed, the landlords doused the village huts with kerosene and set them on fire. The landlords had been further incensed by the fact that the Harijans, inspired by the militant groups, had been agitating for a hike in their minimum wages and had also been resisting attempts to evict them from their settlement.That fateful December night provided the perfect excuse for the landlords to settle scores with the help of the police.

Police Superintendent D.S.Prasad, who took personal command of the police action, however, has a different version to relate. According to him, the Obra police had been "tipped off" about the presence of armed criminals in Nanku Ram's house and a police party had been dispatched to apprehend the criminals and recover the arms. "Till then we did not know that there were extremists in the hut," he says.When the police party arrived, they were refused permission to enter and soon after. a hail of bullets gunned down one of the constables.His story is that some of the extremists escaped and in doing so, set fire to some of the huts. The police also claim to have recovered three of a batch of five rifles stolen from a Home Guard detachment last August.

The facts, however, speak for themselves. Those who benefitted most from the encounter and the destruction of the Harijan settlement were the local upper-caste landlords who, villagers claim, were present in large numbers during the "encounter". District Magistrate B.K.Sinha says that "Kaitha-Bigha was never suspected as an extremist stronghold.The extremist problem has been romanticised by the press and misunderstood by the administration."

However, there is no denying that the Naxalite cult has infiltrated many districts from Nalanda to Aurangabad and places like Patna, Gaya, Bhojpur and Rohtas ever since the '60s.To counter this, the landlords had formed their own caste 'senas' or private armies which, according to estimates, have accounted for over 250 extremists between 1980 and 1984 (INDIA TODAY March 15, 1984).So far the landlords have had the upper hand but the Naxalites have succeeded in infusing the poor and exploited Harijan labourers with a new militancy and a new awareness of their dignity and rights.

But the "rural war" has also led to a splintering in the ranks of the Naxalite groups with the IPF, the most moderate of the groups, having a large following in the interiors of Bihar with the MCC confined to Aurangabad and other factions in control of scattered pockets. However, officials say that the Naxalite groups have been running a "parallel administration" in the area.Landlords admit that the MCC realises tolls from the people and carries out summary executions from landlords who have earned their wrath.

But latest indications are that despite incidents like the Kaitha-Bigha killings, the war is gradually being won by the militants. Many landlords have moved to safer sanctuaries leaving an estimated 10,000 acres of fallow land. Sinha has been suggesting that instead of providing cattle and money to the poor and landless under the Integrated Rural Development Programme, the administration should buy up the fallow land and distribute it to the landless. His argument is that once the people have land, not only would they have an assured income but would be less prone to incitement by extremist groups. So far, however, Sinha's appeal has fallen on deaf ears.

The result is that the influence of the Naxalite groups has expanded rapidly leading to greater tensions and attempts at periodic crackdown by the landlords and the police, of which Kaitha-Bigha was yet another bloody manifestation.

UTTAR PRADESH

Fiery Feuds

THE TROUBLED state of Uttar Pradesh has by now got relatively immune to reports of mass killings. It was hardly surprising that with the ruling party still celebrating its electoral triumph in the state, the massacre of 26 people in one district, including six women and children, in two separate incidents left behind few ripples. Even Chief Minister Narain Dutt Tewari merely pleaded: "Do not compare these killings with Behmai and other massacres. These are just personal family feuds."

Tewari did have a point. There were no signs of any caste feuds or gang warfare in the two cases of mass killings in the state's Sitapur district. In the first, at the Yadav-dominated Mohiddunipur village, a squabble between relations led to the massacre of 21 people in which women and children were burnt alive after they barricaded themselves inside their homes. In Maholi village, less than a week later, six people were gunned down in their sleep in what was another case of local rivalry.

Sitapur is one of the 10 most criminally-prone districts in the state and the incidents were brushed aside as local quarrels. Family feuds, in any event, are not uncommon in Uttar Pradesh. But the magnitude of the tragedy was clearly a cause for concern and administration officials were worried that it could herald the start of a new trend where traditional enmity between families would increasingly result in mass murder. Part confirmation came from the action of the state Government in reviewing the issue of gun licences in the districts. Tewari also ordered law enforcement officials to keep a closer watch on traditional family feuds in their areas.

The background to the Mohiddunipur massacre indicates that the steps were long overdue. The rivalry between the two families of Chandrika Singh Yadav and his brother-in-law Shivlal Yadav, started, incongruously enough, over a dispute over ownership of a mango tree last August. Three weeks later, Chandrika's son, Bhagwan Deen and another relative, Bharati Lal, were shot dead. Shivlal Yadav was arrested along with nine others and charged with murder but released on bail. A key witness in the case was Bhagwati's son. But on January 1, barely a few days before he was due to appear in court to record his statement, Bhagwati himself was kidnapped. His body was discovered the next day in a field.

The Chandrika group lost no time in taking revenge. Within an hour of the body being found, Chandrika and his relations armed themselves and attacked Shivlal's house. Recalls Ram Lal, Shivlal's brother: "When we heard gunshots we locked ourselves up. I managed to run away before our houses were set on fire." Others were not so lucky. Shivlal himself was badly burnt and miraculously escaped death. His wife and 14-year-old son were burnt alive as were three other children.

Barely five days later, the story was tragically repeated in Mahili village where rivalry over property was the root cause of the massacre. The only difference was the victims, members of the family of Gaya Bax Singh, an affluent landowner, were shot one by one at pointblank range while they were asleep. Once again, a festering family feud was the ostensible cause.

According to Pritam Pal Singh, superintendent of police in Sitapur, both the massacres were "freak cases" resulting out of family feuds. Other senior police officials admit that so far the efforts of law enforcement agencies have been designed to counter dacoits. But, says one: "It is a sign of the times that we will now have to look carefully into personal disputes to ensure that such incidents are not repeated." But that is in no way an easy task, as even Chief Minister Tewari admitted last week as the state prepared to face up to what appears to be a new pattern in family disputes—mass murder.

HYDERABAD

A Practical Project

THEY are classes without textbooks. For one hour every week, the 350-odd students of Sri Vidhya Secondary School at Tilak Nagar in suburban Hyderabad are left to themselves to explore and understand the phenomena that passes off as everyday science. Blackboards, flip charts, sketch paper on the walls, personal notebooks and a system of work charts for guidance, all go into making the work study hour, as it is known among the students, an hour they eagerly look forward to. This ongoing experiment to stimulate interest in the study of scientific phenomena in familiar situations gained international recognition in December 1983 when the school founder and principal Indira Seshagiri Rao, 48, and the mathematics teacher, Asha Bhide, 33, got the first prize in the Commonwealth Association of Science, Technology and Mathematics Educators Award at a ceremony in London. The prize was for their project paper on developing materials for teaching science and mathematics so as to develop technical and social skills among schoolgoers. "Writing the paper was easier as we have tried out the concepts and suggestions at the school ever since it was started in 1975," said Rao.

At first glance, all that goes on seems commonplace—a discussion on the use of the neem tree, twigs and leaves, why sponge absorbs more water than cotton cloth, the making of tea or even the drawings of the circuits for the traffic signal at a crossroad. But as Rao points out: "This is the scientific approach to make sure that students realise that most things happening around are no longer mundane, unfathomable everyday occurrences." To make these classes in self-study more meaningful, the teachers have devised projects for interlinked understanding of several subjects for all classes. "We have devised process-based instruction of science through work cards. The work card carries a series of compact learning steps to make it easy for students to learn on their own. And as they work with simple materials of daily life, they pick up several abstract concepts by interweaving disciplines," explained Bhide.

A popular example with teachers and students is the elaborate tea-making project. It begins as a lesson on matter, leading to the study of boiling point, home accounts in the costing for tea and sugar, then an extension into geography when discussing the climate in which tea grows, and also a composition exercise on making tea as part of the language class. The importance of weaving together such diverse subjects is clearly understood by the teachers, for as Bhide says, "this is a mind-opening exercise and should have little to do with the teaching of the syllabus or preparing the students for exams." Introduced as a class outside the regular curriculum, no tests or examinations are held. Due to constraints of time the teachers cannot take up more than one project a class per week without disturbing academic schedules but as Bhide explains; "We can claim what is lost in academic facts and the systematic development of the subject is more than balanced by training in initiative, and the development of a scientific enquiry in students."

The students are clearly enthusiastic about learning so much on their own. "Whether it is making tea, using a solar cooker or trying to prove the Archimedes Principle, the fact that we are able to do it ourselves instead of staring at textbooks if not at the teacher makes us feel better," says one student, Venkatram Shastri 13, of class nine. Manish Kothari, another student felt that activity-oriented learning "answered questions convincingly and raised new questions which we try to solve". Added S. Sushmita 12, a class eight student: "It makes us feel knowledge is ever-expanding and we will have to try to constantly catch up with the latest. That is why we ask the principal to invite somebody to speak to us about computers and space probes."

The role of the teacher in this experiment has also undergone changes. Admitted R. Janaki: "We are tongue-tied as instructional supervisors and have only to oversee and organise what the students are doing. Some turn out to be more talented than the teachers in abstract reasoning and it is sometimes difficult to match student capabilities." To improve their skills the teachers attend workshops on better teaching techniques and aids held in different parts of the country. As Nalini Tanneru, another teacher admitted: "The hold of chalk and talk is slowly going down. Teaching of science must be approached as a tentative search. It is better to look out of the class window when talking about climates and temperatures in a geography class instead of at weather charts and maps."

The Hyderabad school experiment is not restricted to just within the premises of the school. "Even guests who come home are not spared the flood of questions of the curious child," said Ramani Sundaram, an obviously proud mother. The greater challenge is to help those who cannot come to school for various reasons. But even so, the project to make learning an enjoyable experience seems to have become the prime concern of educators in at least this one school.

SANDY STORM
BY SANDEEP PATIL
Rupa & co
Pages: 176; Price: Rs 20

IF INDIAN cricketers were as prolific with their bats as they are with their pens, the psychological menace of Marshall, Holding and Imran would hardly exist at the kind of exaggerated level it does. At no other time have Indian cricketers shown such a proclivity for print as they have in the recent past, whether for various publications during the cricket season or churning out turgid tomes on their various triumphs and failures.

Much of the rather dubious credit for that situation must necessarily go to Rupa & Co, the publishers of the three books on cricket that filled the stands last fortnight. Rupa pioneered the trend with Gavaskar's Sunny Days back in 1976 and have more or less monopolised the field since.

Like the Indian cricket team, however, Rupa also seems to overly depend on Gavaskar for the big score. Runs'n Ruins is Gavaskar's third book, following closely on the heels of Idols, published last year. The second Rupa offering is more of a surprise, authored as it is by Sandeep Patil whose cricketing career has sputtered along like a defective firecracker. But like Pakistan's Imran Khan, Patil has long sported a glamour boy image which will certainly do no harm to the sales of the book. The third book, Great Feats of Indian Cricket is by veteran cricket scribe Partab Ramchand and its attraction would be limited to nostalgia buffs who remember Vijay Hazare, Polly Umrigar and Jasu Patel.

In a sense, however, all three authors have something in common. Both Patil and Gavaskar moonlight as journalists of a kind: Gavaskar as editor of Indian Cricketer and Patil of a Marathi sports magazine. But there, unfortunately, the resemblance ends. The difference between Gavaskar's book and Patil's is like the difference in their batting. Gavaskar in Runs'n Ruins is cautious in his approach, no wild swings or edges, merely setting the records straight on certain issues and unsparing in his self-criticism as would befit a batsman of his stature. The book covers what was perhaps the most frustrating period in his career (hence the 'ruins' in the title) when he was wilting under the pressure of equalling and overtaking the great Sir Don Bradman's record of 29 test centuries during the 1983-84 season.

However, there were other irritants that Gavaskar outlines which did not augur well for Indian cricket. One was the fact that for the first time Indian cricketers like Kapil and Mohinder Amarnath had started writing for publications during a series despite a ban by the board. It was brushed under the carpet but symbolised the fact that cricketers were determined to exploit their professional status to the full and challenge the board's authority in no uncertain terms. Kapil and Amarnath were, however, soon embroiled in another controversy, this one involving prize money. The normal practice had been that any player who wins prize money for Man of the Match or Man of the Series shared it with the rest of the team members. Kapil had won the Man of the Series award for the English tour in 1982 and Amarnath for the Pakistan and West Indies tours that followed. While Kapil had a legitimate excuse in that he was still to receive the money, Amarnath refused to part with his booty on one flimsy excuse after another. According to Gavaskar, Kapil did part with his prize money when he received it later but Amarnath had set a bad precedent and when Anshuman Gaekwad was awarded Man of the Series for the Pakistan series, he promptly refused on the grounds that he would do so only if Amarnath did.

There were other precedents that clearly trouble Gavaskar the cricketer and Gavaskar the former captain. Kapil's tenancy as captain, for one. He expresses astonishment at the casual approach to cricket that Kapil ushered in. There were for example, no team discussions on strategy before most of the matches, no effort to analyse the opposing team's strengths and weaknesses and decide on how to counter them. "We just drifted along and played."

He takes the opportunity in this book to give vent to his pent-up anger at the cricketing pundits who sit in the press box, two of whom celebrated his dismissal during the Ahmedabad Test when he was on 98 by offering to send a case of rum to Mike Holding, the man responsible for his dismissal.

Gavaskar is a much-mellowed man and it shows in his writing. The same, unfortunately, cannot be said for Sandeep Patil. Sandy Storm is at the outset, a misnomer. Sandy is, of course, the anglicised version of his first name which is what his team-mates call him. But the storm is more of a breeze. Patil is undoubtedly a man of many parts, cricketer, playboy, film star, magazine editor, hotel director, singer, model entrepreneur and now, author.

Unfortunately, his debut in the last is hardly as successful as in 1981 when he burst onto the cricketing arena in a blaze of glory with a maiden test century of 174 runs against the fury of Dennis Lillee and Len Pascoe at the Adelaide Oval. Patil is no writer and it shows painfully. His is a career as varied and colourful as any in the history of the game but Sandy Storm hardly does it justice.

He does, however, clear up certain controversies, especially those that existed in 1982 when his batting was bedevilled by his personal problems which included an impending divorce and his commitments to the film industry. He had, according to his version, seriously considered giving up cricket and was only dissuaded from doing so by Gavaskar, Milind Rege and Ashok Mankad.

For the rest, it is a book that does no credit to the author or the publishers. It is badly written and badly edited and the only possible plus point is that it does offer some clues to Patil's psychological profile which has some bearing on his wildly fluctuating cricketing fortunes. It is obvious that Patil has a casual approach to life and lacks the kind of dedication, ambition and commitment that separates the men from the boys. Patil certainly has a long way to go before he can take the liberty of penning his memoirs with such unseemly dispatch.

How Karnataka Explosives is helping the largest coal company in Asia extract this vital fuel source more efficiently

From deep within the bowels of the earth comes coal power. And harnessing this power for a growing nation's needs is Coal India—the largest coal company in Asia.

For a Company this size, efficiency and productivity in the mines is of paramount importance.

And Karnataka Explosives is helping Coal India keep up its efficiency and productivity with Kelvex Water Gel explosives.

Kelvex Water Gel explosives: Safety, economy, performance

Kelvex reduces smoke and toxic fumes as it doesn't contain any nitroglycerine ingredients.

So miners can return to their workface more quickly and safely without the fear of headaches. Kelvex increases productivity and cuts time loss. It's for these reasons that Coal India has placed a substantial order for Kelvex explosives.

Kelvex is sensitive to conventional priming methods yet much more resistant than dynamite to accidental detonation from impact, shock and fire. Every industry safety test proves it.

Kelvex offers greater borehole density. Excellent fragmentation. Minimized danger of hole-to-hole propogation.

And Kelvex comes in a wide range: Kelvex—220, Kelvex—P, Kelvex—500, Kelvex—Extra, Kelvan—Extra, Kelvex—700, Kelvex—800, Kelvex—310 (P1) and Kelvex—800 CPT (siesmic).

TENTH INTERNATIONAL FILM FESTIVAL

An Indifferent Effort

A CHAOTIC inaugural, a marked snub by the American film industry to participate and an information section made up of an indifferent choice of films—these were some of the favourite grouses against the just over Tenth International Film Festival of India. There was, admittedly, a good, strong section of films from Latin America backed by a colourful Brazilian delegation; and the tempestuous Jeanne Moreau turned up as chairperson of the jury, her gorgeous, droopy mouth dropping enough witticisms to raise an otherwise drab, unwieldy and scattered show from the dregs. "Ma'am," someone asked her, at her press conference, "why haven't you written your autobiography yet?" "Ah," replied Moreau, with a toss of head and shrug of shoulder inimitably Gallic, "I started to write the story of my life in 1979. I wrote about 600 pages. But I was only twelve years old then, so I gave up."

Less flip, and considerably less stylist, were the contributions to a segment of the festival that in recent years has come to be regarded as its strongest. The Indian Panorama, devoted to showing the best new Indian films of the year, has been an excellent exercise since its inception at the Madras Filmotsav in 1978. Young feature film makers have found their voices here, regional films have found new audiences, new markets have opened up and distributors been persuaded to loosen their belts and take a risk. The excitement of the unknown—discovering a new director, seeing a different kind of movie—was perceptibly missing this time; the 20-film Panorama seemed a bit like the film festival itself: a curious rag bag of the has-beens and also-rans. At least three of the films (Mahesh Bhatt's Saaransh, Prakash Jha's Hip Hip Hurray and Saeed Mirza's Mohan Joshi Haazir Ho) had been commercially released in 1984, the last only in Bombay city. Adoor Gopalakrishnan's Mukhamukham and Girish Karnad's Utsav have already been widely previewed. And after the picturesque charm of the first feature film ever made in Khasi had been digested, and a few other would-be miracles turned out to be elusive entities, only four films stood out on merit.

All four are in Hindi, all are by film makers whose earlier work has been recognised; and though far from achieving greatness, they afford a breath of originality, a growing concern for social and political realities, and remarkably, make a concerted effort to expose the root of the malaise. Bound by strong narrative themes, all four films exist on one level as personal statements; yet the statements are further defined in each case, so that whether it is a caste war in Bihar or a strike in a city college in which a boy is heckled to death, we are told not merely

Govind Nihalani

As the key characters in Party resolve the crises of their inner lives, it exposes the commitment of those who bandy about phrases like "social commitment" the most.

Saeed Mirza

The idea behind Mohan Joshi is fine: Bombay's insurmountable housing problem and the trauma of surviving in the litigation jungle. But the film's rambling structure tells on the viewer.

how it came about but why. They may seem sentimental, sometimes overwrought by the weight of the subject, and technically imperfect, but they force an audience to take sides.

PAAR: This is Bengali director Gautam Ghose's third feature, but the first in Hindi. Based on a two-page short story by Samaresh Basu, it is solidly constructed, powerfully performed and tells a gripping story of a Harijan couple who are forced, in the face of starvation, to ferry a head of swine across a swollen river in the monsoon. Shown at the Venice Film Festival last year (where it won Naseeruddin Shah the Best Actor award) the Italians hailed the last twelve minutes of the film, the actual river crossing, as great cinema. Perhaps it is; but its great merit as an Indian film lies in the way it traces the flight of the Harijan couple from their village after a massacre by upper caste landlords. What led to the atrocity? What was the origin and gradual incitement that first led the Harijans to kill the landlord's brother? Here, astonishingly, are the answers to those agonising headlines that, now and then, appear in newspapers and then fade away.

Holi, despite the lack of an original theme, has remarkable raw energy and flavour; the authenticity of college life comes through despite technical imperfections.

Ketan Mehta

Paar is easily the best Hindi film of 1984, it is solidly constructed, powerfully performed and tells a gripping story of a young Harijan couple fighting starvation in the city.

Gautam Ghose

Ghose, 34, a Calcutta University graduate and former film buff, supports himself between features by making anything from documentaries to radio jingles and television commercials. His stirring 1982 Bengali feature Dakhal, about a confrontation between farmers and gypsy tribals in rural Bengal, won him a National Award. Paar was financed privately after he persuaded a businessman friend of his to put up the money. And though it has received widespread acclaim as probably the strongest film of 1984, it is still awaiting commercial release. "Being shown at Venice and Cannes isn't, unfortunately, good enough for commercial Indian distributors," says Ghose, who finds the exercise of hustling his films doubly humiliating because, as in the case of Paar, a friend sunk the money to help him make it. Still, his pursuit is continuous; he sees film making as his own voyage of discovery: "I want to find out for myself, and then I want to share. I want to make films for my own reality and milieu. In the process, I hope to discover more of this country and draw a vision of it."

PARTY: Many foreign journalists walked out of this film, and it is not hard to reason why. For one, it isn't the kind of movie they were looking for—or hoping to find—in India. For another, the film's theme of cerebral soul-searching and emotional self-flagellation among a group of gathered intellectuals has been so often seen in the West that it left them understandably cold. But in India, it is the first of its kind: a heavy, turgid, slow-moving film, with dialogues in impossibly high-flown Hindi, it is Govind Nihalani's fourth feature. And a far cry from his earlier films (Aakrosh, Ardh Satya) that established his reputation. A middle-aged socialite, daughter of a well-known politician, decides to throw a party in honour of a recent award her old friend, playwright Barve (Manohar Singh) has received. The guest list is carefully chosen: the powerful lady editor with a weakness for young men, the director of commercial plays, Barve's unfulfilled mistress, Mohini (Rohini Hattangady), young poets, armchair Marxists and an assortment of the urban intellectual elite land up. Many of them are at a point of crisis; most are dreadfully confused. As the evening progresses, the air becomes heavy with despair: jagged ambition, phoney ideology, uncontained emotion come pouring. As many of the key characters try and resolve the crisis of their inner lives, Nihalani turns the film into an expose of sorts, showing up the individual commitment of people who bandy about phrases like "social commitment" the most.

Frankly, who cares? If the director does, then had he dealt with his characters with greater sympathy and perception rather than patronise them, the film would have been saved from becoming an inadvertent parody of itself. And who is such convoluted film for anyway? "For the kind of people who are in it," says the lead actor Manohar Singh. At any rate, Nihalani would be advised to keep the English sub-titles during commercial runs: the Hindi, unfortunately lies beyond the reach of ordinary audiences.

HOLI: Ketan Mehta is best remembered for his first feature, Bhavni Bhavai (1981), an ebullient musical based on a Gujarati folk-tale that won him acclaim on the art cinema circuit. His second feature is in sombre mood: the story of a life in the day of a college, it has, despite the lack of an original theme, a remarkable ring of authenticity about it. Mehta, 32, uses a group of 28 actual college students to establish their escalating frustrations: a workers' strike, postponement of examinations, a fight in the canteen and a confrontation between the students and the faculty, all lead to the ultimate conflagration. The boys turn upon one of their own group—the squealer—and heckle him mercilessly into commiting suicide. The film moves slowly, and is patchy in parts, but it achieves an energy and a flavour that lingers. "It's not merely about one day in the life of a college but the kind of spontaneous, unchannelised violence that breaks with alarming frequency everywhere," explains the small-built, bearded Mehta, whose next film tackles the same subject in a rural environment.

Made within a budget of Rs 10 lakh, culled from private sources as well as a well-intentioned producer, the entire film is composed of long single shots and designed, in the director's word, as an improvisation. "By eliminating the need for too much editing and studio dubbing, and placing the mike and camera as if they were part of the moving group of students, I was trying to achieve unity of technique. As if the camera itself was a participant, both the victim and the victimiser." The ballet-like effect comes through effectively in the film's climax; elsewhere, it becomes a major handicap. And Mehta, fired by the innovation, gets carried away by technique repeatedly to the point of losing control. But the improvisation works excellently in the dialogue: the students' repartee, the crudity and wit of campus language, have a verve that is memorable.

MOHAN JOSHI HAAZIR HO: Director Saeed Mirza, whose third feature this is, is known for the long titles he gives his movies and the "socially relevant" ideas he picks up. The idea here is fine: Bombay's insurmountable housing problem and the trauma of surviving the litigation jungle.

Mohan Joshi is a retired civil servant, resident of a chawl in a Bombay suburb. He has lived there as far as he can remember with his wife, two sons, daughter-in-law and a grandchild. Instead of sitting back and watching his building disintegrate, he decides to request his landlord to initiate repairs. The landlord, a fat cat real estate millionaire played by Amjad Khan, has other designs: he wants the chawl demolished to be able to build a block of luxury flats.

Mohan Joshi sues the landlord; the landlord sues him back. The cases drag on for years, in and out of court, with Joshi, a hapless victim of a pair of loony young lawyers. Mirza's idea is interesting; only its implementation is so long-winded that it takes a heavy toll of the viewer. In retrospect, the director himself concedes that the film's major fault "comes from having too many structures." There is the difficulty of length, aggravated by an attempt at parodying popular B-movie humour that doesn't work. The subject lacks crisp handling, and the comic aspects further slacken its pace.

Like Nihalini, Mirza, 41, received funding from the National Film Development Corporation (NFDC) which assured his film a 15-week run at the NFDC's Akashvani theatre in Bombay.

Having finished with this, Mirza has already embarked upon his next feature—a study of isolation and despair of being part of a minority group in India. Called Karim Langde Pe Mat Ro, "it's a film," says Mirza, "that comes from my own experience. And it also comes from situations like the Bhiwandi riots and the alienation of the Sikhs in Punjab."

"Sweetex helps me stay slim. It saves me 2600 calories a week . . . without actually fasting."

Any doctor will tell you, overweight is mostly due to overeating. And thus excess calorie intake. Remember this simple formula. Six cups of tea a day equals twelve teaspoons of sugar. That's 384 calories daily.* If you cut out sugar in tea and coffee alone, you can save up to 2600 calories a week without actually fasting.

Replace sugar with Sweetex. Invisibly. Effortlessly. It doesn't give you licence to gorge. It isn't a magic formula. But it helps you to cut out calories. It lends support to your calorie controlled diet. And helps you control your weight.

OLD FILMS

Western Boom

FIRST Rudolf Nureyev, then Jeanne Moreau. No one could complain about a paucity of French stars in India, but what does India have to offer France in return? Nargis and Raj Kapoor? Guru Dutt and Waheeda Rehman? They may sound old hat and overexposed in the 1980s but popular Indian cinema of the 1950s is just beginning to catch up in the West.

Since last November Guru Dutt's 1959 classic Kaagaz Ke Phool has been running to full houses in four theatres in Paris. At the Nantes Film Festival a few weeks ago, Mother India, Awara and Shri 420 went down so well that Raj Kapoor, when he arrived, was mobbed on the streets. And at the prestigious Pompidou Centre in Paris, a 120 film package including retrospectives of popular directors of the 1950s generated so much enthusiasm in the summer of 1983, that the Centre has built a spanking new theatre to double the seating capacity. The queues for Guru Dutt and Raj Kapoor movies have never stopped growing since. This summer, as part of the Festival of India in France, the Pompidou Centre will be back in action with a new three-month season.

Significantly, the emphasis has shifted from directors to stars, from new cinema to popular hits of the 1940s and 1950s. Of the 12 stars selected for retrospectives, seven belong to the popular cinema and, with the exception of Amitabh Bachchan, all represent the golden age of Bombay movies. Dilip Kumar, Balraj Sahni, K.L. Saigal, Waheeda Rehman, Nargis and Meena Kumari movies are all set, it seems, to steal the show from the likes of Shabana Azmi, Smita Patil, Naseeruddin Shah, Soumitra Chatterjee and Om Puri. While the retrospectives on the stars will add up to about 60 films, another section of retrospectives called the "One Man Industries" will feature yet more films by Hindi film directors of the 1950s. The Indian parallel cinema gets short shrift, with Shantaram, Bimal Roy, Dev Anand, Guru Dutt and Raj Kapoor taking over completely.

Who has caused this revival of the golden oldies, and how does it manage to grow and glow? Interestingly, it's a small but fiercely dedicated band of people who've opened up popular 1950s Indian cinema to British and French audiences and, if they are to be believed, there are good reasons for such movies to generate interest. "People in the West are getting tired of the standardised, assembly-line Hollywood movies or monotonous TV serials. They want something new. Most people in France aren't even aware that India made movies in the 1950s. It's the novelty of it, and the discovery of hitting upon not just one of the largest but also the oldest film industries in the world," says Alain Jalladeau, director of the Nantes Film Festival.

Waheeda Rehman in Pyaasa (top); Jalladeau and Kabir: nostalgia

Back in 1979, Jalladeau and his brother Phillipe, excited by their discoveries of films in Asia, Africa and Latin America, started a film festival in their hometown 350 km south-west of Paris. Called the "Festival des 3 Continents", the annual show in Nantes every November has become an important and prestigious exposition for discovering new talent. And while movies from low-budget new cinema in India have always had a fair representation, last year Jalladeau took the plunge and showed eight popular films from the 1950s. The response to the selection, ranging from the powerful Do Bigha Zamin to the frothy Mr and Mrs 55, was tremendous. "It's a beginning," says Jalladeau, "but I'm convinced old Indian movies could become big business in the West."

Another promoter who has been convinced of the unutilised potential of 1950s Hindi movies in the West, is a short, dark-haired, Indian girl who's lived in Paris for 16 years and is an avowed Hindi movie freak. Nasreen Kabir eats movies for breakfast, and chases them as if she were on castors. She began by taking a master's degree in cinema, worked as a production assistant in Paris, and then began her doctoral thesis on popular 1950s Indian cinema at the Sorbonne. Her unwavering passion for Hindi movies of that period combined with her encyclopaedic knowledge, has led her to find forums for them in the unlikeliest of places. Her first coup was to persuade Britain's Channel 4 television network to air popular Indian films. The first package of six in 1982 was so successful that the network now regularly shows two seasons of six Indian films each, one of popular movies and the other of new cinema. Kabir followed up the Channel 4 success by convincing the Pompidou Centre in Paris to launch a major Indian cinema season in 1983. The response was so unexpected that Kabir is back in India choosing films for both Channel 4's new season in February as well as the Pompidou Centre's 100-movie selection starting in September this year.

Kabir admits that after Satyajit Ray, the only Indian film makers to receive this kind of attention are Guru Dutt and Ritwick Ghatak. But she thinks that "they have glamour, stars, and good stories. They evoke nostalgia of the great days of movie-making."

Indian officials connected with films concede Kabir's point. "The market for Indian films in France is excellent, there's no doubt about it," says Malati Tambay Vaidya, managing director of the National Film Development Corporation. And even the chairperson of the Tenth Film Festival jury, French actress Jeanne Moreau, admits that what is required of India is "to get in touch with French distributors and the money people" to extend its domain, presently restricted only to intellectuals or film buffs.

In Paris this spring, there are signs that such a breakthrough could be made with sustained backing from the Government and the Indian film industry. After the major success of Kaagaz Ke Phool, underground train stations are plastered with posters advertising the new masterpiece of 1985: Pyaasa by Guru Dutt, made in 1957. —SUNIL SETHI

Shabana and Javed: love songs

◆ Everything seems to be happening all at once in Shabana Azmi's life. December, she married poet Javed Akhtar in a quiet, romantic 2 a.m. ceremony. January, she moved to Delhi as a jury member of the 10th International Film Festival. But the surprising Shabana has managed to fit at least one other interesting thing into her packed life. She has sung—not one, but four songs—for Muzaffar Ali's latest film Anjuman that should pitch her one up on fellow film warbler Rekha. But Shabana, the poised and confident actress of the Indian screen was anything but that when she went to record the album. "I was petrified," she says. "I thought I was going to die." She survived—and if the enthusiastic first reports are true—will live to sing again. And marriage, what's that like? "Who knows," said the new bride, "I've hardly seen my husband since we got married."

Smita: political offers

◆ Arch-rival Smita Patil doesn't seem to be doing too badly for herself either. No, she hasn't got a marriage proposal, but she is getting the come-hither looks as well—from the glamour-hungry world of Indian politics. While the older, sager stars were given Congress(I) parliamentary tickets, the lesser ones in the firmament are now being offered assembly tickets. That includes our girl Smita who has been offered a ticket from Maharashtra. But, as for accepting it, Papa Patil has strict views. A Congressman and former minister himself, he feels that the cinema is a more stable profession. Said he: "Smita has had several offers from assembly constituencies, including Dhule but she can't accept. Her film commitments come first."

Shastri: hit record

◆ Last week, in the Bombay-Baroda Ranji Trophy match, the 22-year-old all-rounder Ravi Shastri gave such a smashing performance that the cricketing world forgot, for a while, to tut-tut over the recent Sunil Gavaskar-Kapil Dev ego clashes. One after another after another came Shastri's sixes, six sixes in one over, making the kind of history cricket fans dream of. Shastri created one record for the world's fastest double century ever, and equalled another 16-year-old record set by the mighty Garfield Sobers who also hit six sixes in one striking over. Quite a show by a man poised to be—if rumours are true—India's next skipper.

◆ Bombay Police Commissioner Julio Ribeiro is one of those good guys who has become extremely popular in his city by simply doing what he does best—hunting out the bad guys. So, when Doordarshan cameraman B.P. Singh decided to film a murder mystery called Sirf Char Din and was scouting around for someone to play an upright policeman, he thought of good old Ribeiro. No problem, smiled the cop, who was filmed without any retakes. Modestly he explains his debut: "The producers phoned up to ask if they could come across since it was a low-budget film and they didn't have money for too many actors, so I said certainly, come today." Now, how many people from dull, grey officialdom get a chance to act in films?

Ribeiro: acting debut

◆ It was the biggest line-up of Indian film stars ever—but, alas, right in front of the prestigious jury of the 10th International Film Festival? But that was not the only blooper that marked the launching of the festival in the capital last fortnight. When a confused official tried to correct the disrespectful formation, the stars—Raj Kapoor, Raj Kumar and so on—simply turned around and bowed to the jury presenting the hysterical audience, now, with their rear view. Said an outraged Adoor Gopalakrishnan: "I walked out not because I was not invited to the stage but because of the whole thing—lining up of stars on the stage with their backs to the jury members. As a film maker I am ashamed."

Considering the size of their operation, we'd be surprised if they did have a highly professional, very experienced staff.

PITIFUL STATE

The cover illustration ("The Opposition: In the Wilderness", January 31) was very expressive. It was, in fact, an exact and revealing depiction of the pitiable condition the Opposition finds itself in.

However, the Opposition appears to still disagree about all they disagree. The severely depleted and the greatly demoralised numbers of the opposition ranks should now set out (of the wilderness) to prove that they do not oppose the Government or even the Congress(I)—they oppose the ills like corruption and bureaucratic red tapism. It is only then that this fragmented group will be worthy of the designation of a national alternative to the Congress(I).

Meerut RASHME ROSHAN LALL

■ Your cover story gave balanced reasons for the total rout of the Opposition. The recent hustings have clearly proved that public memory is not as short-lived as political leaders think. The politics of "coalition" opposition leaders so fervently advocated fell on deaf ears.

Bombay C.S. SAMPATH KUMAR

CLEANING UP

Rajiv Gandhi's move to revamp the ministries so that the new Government can function well and fulfil the expectations of the people is a welcome move ("Rajiv Gets Going", January 31). But how far he will be successful remains to be seen unless a radical change is effected in the entire bureaucratic structure of the country. Our bureaucracy is based on the colonial system which is now outdated. All those in the administrative services never stay in one department long enough to be actually able to understand its problems and therefore remain apathetic to their subordinates by whom the actual work is done. A day will come when the system will collapse like a house of cards.

New Delhi RAJEEV KUMAR JAIN

HEAVY BURDEN

The huge tricoloured garland presented to Rajiv Gandhi on the massive mandate won at the hustings symbolises the victory, and also the heavy burden that rests on the "shoulders" of the Congress(I), in whom the voters have reposed their absolute confidence ("Historic Mandate", January 15).

Coorg C.P. BELLIAPPA

■ A historic mandate—yes; a massive mandate—agreed; but a popular vote—certainly not. The large percentage of voting that went the Opposition way belies this. The number of votes bought through sympathy and constant projection of the late prime minister through posters, speeches and also on television and gimmicks like loan melas—all these take away from the popularity of the vote, to say nothing of the attacks on the Opposition apropos the Anandpur Sahib Resolution. The electorate did not even vote intelligently except in Andhra Pradesh and Jammu & Kashmir.

Bangalore A. BRUTO

■ The mandate was nothing but a massive publicity stunt. The ruling party won the elections by exploiting the innocence of the illiterate and the immature electorate, basing strategy on the question of unity and the Hindu backlash. Besides the vast resources, men and machinery at its command, as well as large public funds, more than contributed to the win.

New Delhi ROSHAN LAL

■ The 1984 general elections definitely proved one point—the Indian voter can no longer be taken for granted. He has become shrewd. He has shown that he is totally dissatisfied with the Opposition. I hope the new year will herald a new era in the history of Indian politics.

quoted to have said that he is a zero in politics but when the zero hits the right place it expands ten times. But he seems to have missed the basic mathematical rule that zero multiplied by any number will still remain a zero. Bachchan's expectations will not materialise as he will still remain a zero.

Calcutta — JAIDEV SINGH

NO WAVE

Your Comment ("The Dangers of Arrogance", January 15) reflected the thoughts of a majority of right thinking people. The electorate has done its job and it is now for the ruling party and the Opposition to play their respective roles for the good of the country.

It was not the sympathy wave, the Rajiv wave or even the Punjab wave that paved the way for the massive mandate for the Congress(I). The basic fact was that we were left with no choice after Mrs Gandhi's assassination.

Calcutta — SUBIR KUMAR LAHIRI

■ Congratulations for predicting the election results so accurately. Your comment in the editorial that people have accused INDIA TODAY of having influenced the election with its forecast is very surprising because not more than 10 per cent of India's population read the magazine. INDIA TODAY is targeted at a different segment of the society.

Ahmedabad — SANIL NARANG

NOT CRICKET

In the article "Superstar Wars" (January 15) it was stated that the selection committee was perfectly justified in its decision to drop Kapil Dev and the hard-hitting middle order batsman Sandeep Patil as a "disciplinary measure". I agree with the fact that an undisciplined man should be punished but where is the justification in dropping Kapil and weakening the team? For his undisciplined behaviour Kapil could have been given a more personal kind of punishment, maybe in the form of smaller fine.

Purnia — R.C. MISTRY

■ It is really surprising that a person of N.K.P Salve's calibre should make utterly irresponsible statements like "if Kapil was dropped, he was dropped on grounds of indiscipline. The selection committee has erred". Mr Salve, would you put the morale of the team first and foremost or the interest of an individual who is behaving in an irresponsible manner?

After having made this statement, regarding Kapil's inclusion in the team, he goes on to say that it is solely the selectors discretion. Two absolutely contradictory statements.

Bangalore — H. RAJSHEKHAR

■ The selectors too seemed to have joined the rat race—with success. Your story, however, ignored the series of gaffes committed by them. The only right decision they took was the rejection of Salve's obnoxious proposal. One hopes that having suddenly woken up to realise the urgent need to enforce discipline in the team, they will stick to this principle with impartiality and within the norms.

Varanasi — PANKAJ KUMAR

■ I would like to point out that Kapil Dev has not been on the Test scene for a decade unless the span of six years (1978-1984) is a decade. Nor has Kapil been sacked for the "remaining bouts of the series" but was only dropped for an international and a Test. Kapil was only playing a "natural game" and what else but an aggressive game is Kapil's natural game. Even when he plays a longer innings he is always on the offensive. The only difference is that that innings is dubbed a "responsible innings" by the media, but this particular innings though typical, was short and thus criticised.

Gavaskar has often played rash shots in the past—under Kapil's captaincy—and got away with lame excuses like he was just trying to enjoy cricket. Surely a Test match cannot be treated so lightly. It is very clear that Gavaskar has an overbloated ego and cannot tolerate any other player of the same stature in the Indian side. The unconditional recall of Kapil for the fourth Test proves beyond doubt that he had been dropped for causes other than the breach of discipline.

Ajmer — PARITOSH JAIN

■ The story portrayed a well-balanced picture of the prevailing state of affairs in the Indian dressing-room. Cricket has ceased to be gentlemen's game and has become a full-fledged business proposition where players resort to all tactics to secure financial benefits. Money and fame appear to be the only concern, even on the playing fields, glorious nuances of the game have sadly taken the back seat. Added to this are ego problems which weigh heavily on players' behaviour and attitude which, in turn, show adverse results in the game itself. And Kapil's case, unfortunately vindicates this tragic view.

UNISTAR® LT-PEX Cables

Advantages are as below compared to conventional Thermoplastic (i.e. PVC) power cables:-

- Higher power rating.
- Higher emergency overload rating.
- Higher short circuit rating.
- Higher insulation resistance (1000 times more than that of PVC).
- Higher resistance to moisture (100 times more than that of PVC).
- Lower installation cost because of light weight, smaller dimension and more flexibility (about 15% less than that of PVC cable).
- Smaller bending radius.
- Capacity to withstand localised hot spot temperature (very important for industrial wiring in steel plant, power stations etc.)
- Resistant to chemicals and corrosive gas etc.-hence suitable for installation in polluted atmosphere.
- Resistance to vibration, hot impact etc. and no hazard of hot deformation
- May be supplied with flame retardant thermoplastic or thermosetting sheath protection to meet flame retardant tests as per IEC 322-1 and BS: 4066.
- Quick method of jointing and termination with simple non-expensive accessories.
- Longer designed life.

In short these cables combine the advantages of PILC and PVC power cables eliminating their demerits and total installed cost is much lower compared to that of PILC or PVC power cables.

Manufactured to meet the requirements of IS: 7098 (Part-I) and IEC: 502.

Ideal for general transmission and distributions of Power and also for specilised application in industrial wiring.

The Other Half

PRIME MINISTER Rajiv Gandhi represents a new ethos in Indian politics. He is young, has shown some dynamism in recent weeks, and talks a new language of modernity, technocracy and efficiency. The prime minister is also surrounded by aides and advisors who symbolise a management culture and who represent the aspirations of a growing and increasingly assertive middle class. But amidst all the talk of computers, industrial policy liberalisation, technology imports, globally competitive scales of production, centres of excellence and much else, the prime minister and his aides must be careful about not forgetting some basic Indian realities. The talk of readying for the twenty-first century is all very well, but the poor are still with us and will remain with us for a long time.

Half the population still lives below the poverty line, and most of them do not get the minimum required intake of 2,000 calories a day. Despite bursting granaries and record food stocks, per capita cereal consumption has gone up precious little in the last three decades: from 350 g a day to 400 g. There are more illiterate Indians today than in 1947, and there is enormous pressure on the land. The last two decades have seen a virtual explosion in the numbers of the landless, and of tiny agricultural holdings that cannot support a farming family. The basic shift from agricultural to industrial and service occupations is taking place much too slowly, so the battle against unemployment has been a losing one. Three decades ago, a little more than 70 per cent of the population was engaged in agricultural and related operations; the figure today is only slightly under 70 per cent. Yet the urban unemployed have multiplied manifold.

Rajiv Gandhi did mention poverty in his national broadcast soon after assuming office, but in an almost passing fashion. And the flurry of activity since then has been on streamlining, liberalising, modernising, computerising. The promise of a refashioned 20-point programme has not materialised as yet, and there is no mention of such earthy problems as rural indebtedness, bondage, malnutrition, and land reforms.

With large numbers still caught in the poverty trap, and with six five-year plans having failed to pull them out into the sunshine, it would be folly for the new government to forget the poor and focus its attention on the better placed of the two sectors of a dual economy and society. While the needs of the economy's increasingly sophisticated industrial superstructure cannot and should not be ignored, the talk of entering a new millennium must be tempered by a constant awareness of basic problems that have remained the same since 1947.

Education provides an excellent example of the way in which priorities can get skewed because of a focussing of attention on modernisation, on creating centres of excellence, and on bringing the communications revolution into the classroom. For the Government has shown no awareness yet of the fact that more than half the five lakh primary schools in the country lack proper buildings, 40 per cent have no blackboards, 70 per cent have no children's books, and over 80 per cent have no lavatories. This is a shocking state of affairs, and it should be the primary objective of the new education policy that is being worked out to remedy this situation.

The thinking in and around New Delhi's South Block also betrays a rather naive fascination with capital-intensive technology that ignores the capital-scarce nature of the economy. A more realistic approach must focus on less capital-intensive but equally 'efficient' technologies. Apart from being more employment-intensive, these will also help disperse industrial activity across the country instead of focussing it in and around increasingly claustrophobic urban megalopolises. There are no easy solutions here, and this should not be a temptation to plump for the seemingly ready-made solutions offered by foreign collaborations. Innovative and enterprising solutions and approaches must be sought out and pursued.

Malnutrition is another priority area that has not received enough attention in the last month, as is primary health care. India leads the world in such unwanted areas as blindness because of vitamin A deficiency, leprosy and tuberculosis, and the state of the primary health centres is often no better than that of the primary schools. The infant mortality rate, at 94 per 1,000 births, is admittedly lower than in many countries with comparable levels of per capita income, but is much higher than China's 67, not to speak of Vietnam's 53 and Sri Lanka's 32 per 1,000. The vast majority of the country's children are malnourished, and suffer impaired physical and mental abilities. It is not that the solutions to many of these problems are not known, and some of them are in fact quite cheap: it costs little to distribute vitamin A tablets, or to have a major oral rehydration programme that prevents deaths from diarrhoea. But neither of these programmes is being carried out on a large enough scale.

Growth and modernisation will not automatically solve these and other similar problems. And Mrs Gandhi's 'direct attack on poverty' through such tools as the Integrated Rural Development Programme, the National Rural Employment Programme and the Minimum Needs Programme were vulnerable to both leakages and poor implementation—as Rajiv Gandhi has himself pointed out. So it will now be a key test for the Government as to how well it works out new solutions or implements the old solutions with better effect. Right now, however, it must begin to show an awareness of the need for paying attention to the other half.

AND HERE ARE A FEW THINGS THAT ARE.

Perhaps nothing quite expresses the uniqueness of the Vazir Sultan Tobacco Company as the mystique of 'Charminar', the name that has meant a unique and special experience to generations of smokers.

This is the 'Charminar' tradition.

And though the company is constantly adapting itself to contemporary needs and preparing for the future, it preserves and nurtures this long and unique tradition.

Some of these changes have been quite evident over the last couple of years.

The introduction of Charms.

The Charminar Challenge sports and adventure events.

The 'Music is Gold' concerts.

The Charms festivals of music, dance and theatre.

These visible external changes have been possible because of the changes that are taking place internally.

At the heart of this change is the process of modernising our plant and equipment, our skills, and our organisational processes which encourage people to work together.

To crystallise all these changes, the Vazir Sultan Tobacco Company Limited is making one more change.

It is changing its name to VST Indust Limited.

A few things, however, will never change.

The unique blending skills that have created some of the largest-selling branc the country. The consistent quality of our cigarettes. And the value for money that have come to expect from us.

TALKING GREEK

■ There lives, in Bombay, an editor of a weekly and a daily who considers himself —and has been saying so with particular stridency in the last few days—God's gift to journalism and mankind. On December 24, 1984, the day Bombay went to the polls in the elections to the eighth Lok Sabha this gentleman's paper carried, just under the picture of the trade-mark canine, a photograph of a banner which usually flutters on Marine Drive. The banner said: "Greek dictionary meaning of 'Idiot'—man who did not vote." Underneath the newspaper had captioned: "Exercise your franchise: Nana Chudasama's self-explanatory message to voters currently on display at Marine Drive..."

Anyone would have expected the free, frank and fearless editor to follow the advice he was splashing all over his daily. However, advice given is not always taken. On polling day, 62.70 per cent of Bombay's voters exercised their franchise. The editor, by all accounts, was not one of them. According to reports, he was away in the cool environs of Khandala, having gone there on Friday, December 21, 1984 and returned on Wednesday, December 26, 1984. What was that Greek dictionary saying?

BRIDLED GROOM

■ So black is the image of the police in India that they are often clubbed together with the thieves and robbers they are supposed to be hunting. But a family in Bangalore has good cause to think in kindlier terms of them.

In Bharatinagar, a wedding was under way. Drums beat and pipes wailed and the bride and the groom were just about to strangle each other with garlands when the boy's parents put on the famous this-is-not-enough-and-you-promised-us-more-act and walked out. As the girl's parents discovered soon afterwards, they left with some jewellery which had been given to them earlier.

This is where the police come in. They came promptly, collared the escaping horde and retrieved the family jewels. But there was still the question of the bride with one garland and no one around to garrot it with. So they looked around, saw a presentable looking chap in the background and pushed him, blushing and bewildered, into the limelight. Whereupon the girl collapsed in his arms, the father and mother swooned with joy, and the police strutted out with smug and satisfied looks.

BALL BULLIES

■ On Sundays at least half of Bombay's vehicles get off the roads to give aching crankshafts and paralysed shock absorbers a rest. And the cricketers come out in droves. They bring with them battered bats, scuffed balls, moth-eaten wickets and two bricks, which are used to prop up the stumps.

Last fortnight, a match was in progress near Nariman Point, which on Sundays looks like a set for Before the Martians Landed. Unfortunately, just as the bowler delivered a viciously spinning ball, two policemen whizzed up on a motorcycle parked on the pitch and, after a few well-chosen words, grabbed the bat and the ball and whizzed away.

The match resumed after a few minutes with a spare bat. Well into the second over, the policemen came whizzing in again, obviously on another smash and grab raid. The sub-inspector's dark glasses glinted with pleasure as he brought the bike to halt with a flourish—and promptly tumbled off as the wheel ran over the ball which had innocently rolled up. By the time he and his acolyte picked themselves up, the Indian second eleven had vanished.

TRAILER TROUBLE

■ Roads, as the policeman just found out, can be very dangerous things to trifle with. And roads which twist and turn as if they thought they were Machiavelli are the worst of all. A particularly deceptive stretch is the one which leads to Khandala from Bombay on the Bombay-Pune road.

Last month a trailer was crawling up what the warning signs graphically display as a 'steep hill'. It was an unusually long trailer, carrying very long steel pipes. At one of the hairpin bends it got stuck. The cab turned the corner, but the trailer's sides caught on the mountainside.

Pushing and pulling and prodding and swearing made no difference. Meanwhile, a long line of cars and trucks with overheated engines lined up behind. Finally, everybody had had enough.

The trailer was unhooked and shunted to one side. The cab rolled on down and returned with a cable which was attached to the trailer. A stone at the bend of the hairpin acted as the pulley. Then there was the curious sight of the cab halfway down the slope, the cable disappearing round the curve, and the trailer inching up the slope on the other side. Talk of ingenuity.

Breaking into the secret world of film-making

There are only six companies in the entire world who make photographic films right from start to finish.

HPF is one of them.

A roll of film is simple to look at but not simple to make.

Film manufacturing is a highly complex business requiring advanced technology, sophisticated manufacturing facilities and the highest standards of quality.

No wonder, there are only six completely integrated film manufacturing companies in the world! HPF is one of them.

A whole industry in the dark

Film making is such a tough business that the bulk of the manufacturing process must be done in total darkness — in an atmosphere that is 100% dust-free. HPF has perfected these operations in the pollution-free atmosphere at Ooty. And trained a workforce to meet exacting requirements.

HPF has developed its own technology for critical processes. For manufacturing internationally renowned photo grade silver nitrate. And for synthesising chemicals and dyes for import substitution.

From total dependency to self-sufficiency

Despite the overwhelming complexity of the business HPF has done remarkably well.

From total dependance on imports to self reliance.

From teething problems of yesterday to a profitable company that works today to 180% of the original rated capacity.

From a conversion unit to a totally integrated production facility.

HPF today is a multi-product company, manufacturing photographic, cinematographic, lithographic, radiographic and industrial radiographic film. Film made with Indian knowhow, Indian materials and Indian expertise.

Film every Indian can be proud of.

RAJIV GANDHI

"People's Expectations Are Scary"

RAGHU RAI

HE HAS a firm handshake, and looks you straight in the eye. Power seems to rest lightly on him as he sits in his South Block office, clad in a smartly cut kurta-pyjama and a mildly incongruous green quilted sleeveless jacket. Despite being heavily pressed for time (the Sri Lankan Ambassador was waiting outside, to be followed in short order by seven others before a dinner engagement four hours later), Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi answered questions in an unruffled, measured monotone. He smiled easily, but the affability did not extend to parting with too much hard information, and a number of questions were parried without giving offence.

There were no grand visions, no spelling out of a Nehruvian world view. Instead, there was a matter-of-fact approach to problems. If he had not decided what precise policy options he would choose in a number of areas, he seemed to have abundant confidence in his own ability to choose the right one once the options were placed before him. And if something had to get done, why, sure it would get done. No question.

And yet, despite all the evidence of a young prime minister in a hurry, he was relaxed, the basic underlying personality trait of caution surfacing every once in a while.

He has learnt some things quickly. That a prime minister should speak carefully, for instance. Talking of rationalising taxes, he spoke about not needing chartered accountants to file returns, then quickly added "It may seem I am against chartered accountants, but I am not." Yet he would not be deterred from speaking his mind on sensitive issues despite the presence of a cautioning advisor.

He promised hard decisions in a number of areas, said the Government would pull out of some activities in which it is currently engaged, indicated that action would be taken against managements that made companies sick, promised a more aggressive family planning programme, and held out hope of a quick solution to the Assam problem. On Punjab, however, the mood was not so easily hopeful. He also spoke out against subsidies, and declared that a "point of no return" would be reached if Pakistan made an atomic bomb. The message was clear: if Pakistan made the bomb, India would too.

The interview, the first to an Indian publication after his electoral victory, was conducted by Editor AROON PURIE and Senior Editor T.N. NINAN. Excerpts:

Q. You have interpreted the massive mandate that you have got as a mandate for change. Do you find it ironical that a ruling party has been returned with a massive mandate for change? Why wasn't a lot of what you are doing now not done before?

A. The mandate is not just for change. I think it's both a continuity of certain ideals, certain ideologies, of certain policies, but a change in implementation. We have been making changes continuously. You cannot expect everything to be perfect the minute it is made. Things change, they are dynamic as you progress, the requirements change, demands change. So you change with that.

Q. Recently there has been a tremendous flurry of activity with change in personnel, restructuring of departments, new policies. This in a sense is the easy bit, now you have to get down to specifics. What is the next phase?

A. You'll see.

Q. You have laid a lot of emphasis on accountability of government servants. One of the key things necessary for accountability is that you should be able to sack people. Would you be able to do that?

A. No, I do not think we want to sack government servants. I don't think it is going to be necessary to sack them.

Q. Then what is the option?

A. There are infinite methods of punishment not as severe as sacking, but if you introduce sacking I think you will leave it wide open to abuse by somebody who would want to abuse it.

Q. When you talk about streamlining do you envisage the fact that you may be cutting off certain roles that the Government is playing, like it shouldn't be in certain activities?

A. I agree it shouldn't be in certain areas.

Q. Then what areas do you have in mind?

A. I cannot tell you all that, but yes, we will have to make some hard decisions. We have been taking the soft line for a little too long, not so much the Centre as the states have been taking the soft line. This includes our states also. I am not differentiating between the Opposition and the Congress. We have been subsidising too many things.

Q. When you talk of soft options, there is the recent case of casual workers in the Eastern Railway, first being dismissed and then being reinstated. Isn't that taking the soft line?

A. The decision was taken when the ministers were changing over. So it was a political decision to sack them and it was wrong. They should have consulted the minister in charge. As soon as the minister took over they consulted him.

"HARD DECISIONS WILL HAVE TO BE TAKEN EVERYWHERE IN EVERY SECTION AND I CAN TELL YOU THAT IF TODAY WE DO NOT TAKE HARD DECISIONS THEN IT IS GOING TO BE A LONG TIME BEFORE ANYBODY IS GOING TO GET A CHANCE."

Q. So the people were actually needed?

A. So he says. Yes. They were ticket collectors and their induction has increased the revenue of the railways.

Q. Did you have to intervene in this case?

A. No. The complaint came to me. I said don't come to me, go to the railway minister.

Q. Do you see the need for such ticket collectors in all the railways in all the states?

A. I am not the railway minister. You'll have to ask Mr Bansi Lal.

Q. Do you intend to change the labour laws in order to promote the efficiency which you are so keen about?

A. Hard decisions will have to be taken everywhere in every section and I can tell you that if today we do not take hard decisions then it is going to be a long time before anybody is going to get the chance.

Q. What kind of hard decisions are you talking about?

A. Difficult to specify. I'll get into trouble if you print them.

Q. You speak of decentralising decision-making in the government departments, but the Prime Minister's Secretariat continues to play a pivotal role in the decision process. Do you see it becoming less so when you decentralise?

A. The secretariat will play a pivotal role in decision-making above a certain level, where basic policies are involved, but below that we will have to leave the implementation to whoever is in charge. We just follow up the implementation, which does not mean that we go to see whether people are sitting in their offices at 9 o' clock.

Q. But the general feeling is that the Prime Minister's Secretariat plays a far bigger role than that.

A. I don't think so. They have come to me with certain things and I have thrown it back to them, the various ministries.

Q. You want them to make their own decisions?

A. Yes. It is their problem.

Q. What do you mean by certain level?

A. Well, policy decisions. Money decisions will of course have to be done sitting together, certain decisions are made at the Cabinet Committee of Political Affairs level and some which have to go to a full Cabinet.

Q. What time frame do you have for working out a solution for Punjab?

A. It is very difficult to put a time frame on Punjab. Let us understand where we are. We have the Akalis as one group, we have the Government as another group. We have a large amount of Sikhs, and Hindus and Muslims and Christians and other religions in Punjab who are neither Akali nor Congress and when the Akalis say that this is a Sikh problem, we must understand that they are talking about a group within Punjab which is not representative of Punjab. The Akalis are not even representative of the Sikhs. They represent some Sikhs in Punjab. So when we look at this problem it has to be much wider than that. What we need is that some Sikhs either from the Akali Dal or from outside or from any group must come up and positively speak up against the extremists and terrorists. We are going to sort this problem anyway, but this would help a lot.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

Q. Can you solve the problem without the Akalis?

A. Depends on the Sikhs.

Q. Do you see any change in the Akali attitude since you last spoke to them?

A. Well, I have not spoken to them. I do not know about the senior leaders, but the next level of leadership which is speaking up now has certain parts which are positive, but one or two people are still tied up in knots.

Q. Besides the political demands, there still seems to be a certain sense of insecurity amongst the Sikhs.

A. We have done a lot. The major insecurity was in Delhi after the beginning of November. Most of the people who left have started coming back. People from Alwar have started coming back, some people from Punjab have started coming back. We have taken steps for their protection and rehabilitation in Delhi.

Q. What about the judicial inquiry?

A. We don't think it will help at the moment. It would raise issues which are really dead.

Q. How do you react to Bhajan Lal's proposal to merge Punjab, Haryana, and Himachal Pradesh?

A. It is a huge question and I do not think we have discussed it enough to just react to it. No, I don't object to it. It is something we could look into provided it does satisfy the people in Punjab. They are part of the solution, we cannot push something like this on them.

Q. Do you see the state going to elections in March?

A. I think it would be difficult. We have not got a critical report from Punjab. Well, the army is back in the barracks and there is not much more army in Punjab now than there normally is, being a border state and front area.

Q. Do you think the Anandpur Sahib Resolution is secessionist?

A. In some parts, yes.

Q. But hasn't it been watered down in 1978?

A. They have not clarified what they have watered down and we have suggested that they take it to the Sarkaria Commission within the terms of reference of the commission, and let Justice Sarkaria look at it, but the Akalis are not keen on doing it for some reason. They want the Government to take it, they don't want to take it, and we don't want to be party to take such a resolution as the Anandpur Sahib to the Sarkaria Commission. Let them take it and let it be evaluated on its merits.

Q. What about elections in Assam?

A. Assam elections are different to Punjab, because in Punjab it is a law and order problem and in Assam it is enumeration. It is not that we cannot hold elections in Assam tomorrow, but we do not have the electoral rolls. As soon as this is done, we could have elections.

"THE AKALIS ARE NOT EVEN REPRESENTATIVE OF THE SIKHS. THEY REPRESENT SOME SIKHS IN PUNJAB. SO WHEN WE LOOK AT THIS PROBLEM IT HAS TO BE MUCH WIDER THAN THAT."

Q. What are the prospects of settling the other outstanding issues in Assam?

A. I think the boys are in a much better mood for settlement. Some people that I have met and some feedback that we have got about their own meetings is that they also feel we understand their problems and that we are trying to do whatever can be done, and they understand our constraints.

Q. Why do you think the Congress fared so badly in Andhra Pradesh in the recent general elections?

A. Maybe the Government being toppled , yes, and other such things. The main thing is that we were not in touch with the people, and also bad organisation.

Q. Do you think regionalism weakens national unity? Or is it something which has to be accommodated?

A. It depends on the regionalism. In Tamil Nadu, for example, we have regional parties, but they have always been pro-India. Let us say they have not tried to pull apart. What is more dangerous about regional parties is that they do not really have a national perspective, they see things in a very short-term perspective, which really brings you back to soft options—subsidise this, subsidise that, because it gives them popularity. But somebody has to pay for it. It's not free. Something that is being subsidised in Andhra, subsidised in Bengal, is being paid for.

Q. Do you think NTR is anti-Indian?

A. No. I don't think that NTR is anti-Indian.

Q. If you were in the state of the Opposition, what would you do?

A. I think I would have a good think about what I've done and why I have been cut to shreds by the people.

Q. But does the lack of an opposition worry you?

A. No. Not at all, because I know I won't lose my head.

Q. Now regarding the economy you have spoken extensively about streamlining the public sector, but the growth of the public sector has been mainly due to the taking over of sick units. Will you stop this?

A. I think we really have to have a hard look at the policy. We might change it. We have to also be tougher on the managements that make these units go sick.

Q. How do you mean tougher?

A. We'll find a way. Everybody says that what I have suggested is much too tough. That is the problem.

Q. Do you think the taxes in this country are too high?

A. Although the taxes look high, if you start taking all the deductions then they can actually come down to very low taxes.

Q. Are you saying that by getting rid of some of the deductions and concessions, you can then reduce taxes?

A. We would like to clean it up. Don't have too many boxes, make the whole thing simpler so that people can do it themselves, instead of having to get chartered accountants. I don't think we can make it as simple as I've earned so much, the deductions are so much, and here is my cheque. But we should move in that direction.

Q. Taxes like gift tax and estate duties yield little revenue but create opportunities for corruption. Have you thought of abolishing them?

A. They need to be rationalised.

Q. You keep talking about taking India into the 21st century. What do you mean? What century do you think we are in now, economically?

A. It is a mixed picture. It is our way of thinking which we have to change. We are still very backward in that way. We are really pushing everything on a day-to-day basis. We are short of something we need, another 5 per cent. Okay, we give another 5 per cent, but we never think of what we need in 10 years or 15 years from now, not only in quantity, but also in quality. And unless we start switching over now we will not be able to make it in the next 15 years. For example, roads. Are we going to keep making these little pot-holed roads ? Okay, we cannot afford to make motorways, but if we have to have these pot-holed roads, 15 years from now we will be in a total mess. I said roads because they are something we keep bumping on. Maybe we should cut back and have fewer roads but better roads where they are needed.

Q. Basically you are talking about a change in approach.

A. There should be a change in approach in education. Not just churning out what I feel are literate but uneducated people.

Q. What do you hope to achieve by de-linking degrees and jobs?

A. De-linking degrees is only reducing a demand for the B.A. degree, because the Government says you should have a degree.

Q. But then with lower qualification requirements, you would probably have more people applying for the same job.

A. Yes, but you need to weed them out from there. You can have a proper test, which can be fairly independent, objective and fast and you need not have numerous B.A.s who are jobless.

Q. But if you don't have enough jobs anyway, then what do you do?

A. That is where the education system comes in because you have to reorient it so that the jobs are different. We cannot in today's world possibly employ the number of people who we have unemployed, in industries. They have to come into information handling, they have to come into services, so the education must be such that there is a demand for that. There should be a shift in approach.

Q. All the Government's plans for development can be negated if family planning is not given proper attention. Does your government plan to be more aggressive about this than in the past? Do you still consider it a sensitive issue?

A. Yes, it is very sensitive, but we must make headway on it. We are not going to be hesitant about it, if we did, it is going to sink us. But yes, voluntarily, absolutely. Have more incentives than disincentives. It really comes back to education. It is the educated families who are having less children.

Q. You have said that if Pakistan made the atomic bomb, it will change things completely. How will it change things?

A. It will be a point of no return on the subcontinent if someone has nuclear weapons. We will have to review our policy to see how we are going to counter that imbalance.

Q. What are you going to do about the Tamil militants from Sri Lanka who are in Tamil Nadu?

A. We do not have any hard information on this. They've presented me some pamphlets and leaflets that the Tamils—the refugees—are printing. There is nothing we can do about that. Anybody is allowed to print whatever. We've checked it out, yes, people are printing them but there is no training to my knowledge. What we want in Sri Lanka is a settlement which will enable the refugees to go back. We cannot have 40,000 people here, maybe there are even more now. We cannot have people who have relatives closely related in Sri Lanka. What is going on there is really terrible. We feel that no military or enforced settlement would be conducive to the refugees going back so they must come to some sort of political settlement. We must create an atmosphere where these poor chaps can go back.

"IT WILL BE A POINT OF NO RETURN ON THE SUBCONTINENT IF SOMEONE HAS NUCLEAR WEAPONS. WE WILL HAVE TO REVIEW OUR POLICY TO SEE HOW WE ARE GOING TO COUNTER THAT IMBALANCE."

Q. But it seems more and more difficult—this political settlement. What is your attitude towards a new state?

A. I don't think we have come to that point yet. But it needs statesmanship and I hope that the people of Sri Lanka will rise to it.

Q. You started out into politics very hesitantly, but now that you are at the pinnacle, what are your personal goals?

A. I didn't have any personal goals when I came, but after being in politics, after seeing people, their difficulties, their wants, I think our goal has to be to eliminate poverty from India. I don't say that in five years we can do it, but in 10 to 15 years, we can make a major dent in things.

Q. Before you came into politics, you had a quiet life, in that you did not make any public statements about any public policies. There is an element of surprise about the range of initiatives you have taken. Were you thinking about all these matters earlier?

A. Yes, one thought of them, but I never thought that I should do this and why haven't you been doing it, but yes, it has always been at the back of my mind.

Q. Are you pleased that you are in a position to do something about it?

A. Yes. I am pleased that I am in a position to do something about it, and with support, I think we will be able to do something about it, but what is scary is the expectations people have.

ESPIONAGE

THE SPY SENSATION

JANUARY 15 is Army Day and the high point of the occasion is the traditional reception on the lawns of Army House, the residence of the chief of the Indian Army. This year's guest list, in painful retrospect, could not have been chosen with more macabre irony. Apart from the President, the prime minister and senior members of their staff were the top brass of the armed forces, defence attaches of all the foreign legations in New Delhi, the defence minister and his senior staff, and the country's top-ranking bureaucrats. That exclusive nucleus also happened to represent the cast that, the very next day, was to make screaming headlines in the most sensational spy drama in Indian history.

Some of the dramatis personae, in an even more ironical twist, were actually present. Among the diplomats, one in particular was the target of some good-natured banter on his newly-acquired beard: Colonel Alain Bolley, 53, the deputy military, naval and air attache at the French Embassy. Bolley was a popular man, witty and urbane, and after four-and-a-half years in New Delhi, a familiar face in that kind of circle.

Another nearby knot of guests were also destined to figure prominently in the impending drama. P.C. Alexander, the tall and solemn principal secretary to the prime minister and the seniormost bureaucrat in the Government, was engaged in convivial conversation with the defence secretary and the secretary, defence production. They, along with Bolley, were blissfully unaware that they were the focus of unusual attention that evening. For the last two months, in what was the biggest surveillance operation ever mounted by the country's counter-intelligence agencies Bolley, along with at least 30 bureaucrats and their personal staff had been constantly shadowed in an attempt to define the contours of what appeared to be an extensive espionage ring operating in the most sensitive offices of the Indian Government.

Narain, the only non-official member of the ring and the suspected main link in the espionage chain, was hardly a James Bond type. Yet he was in possession of documents that contained vital and sensitive information that will be crucial to the case against him.

Just how extensive the ring was, and how serious their crime, was quickly apparent. On the night of January 16, special squads of the Intelligence Bureau moved in simultaneously on different locations in the capital in a sweep that was to net them a sensational catch. The key raid was in a dilapidated building at 16, Hailey Road where two men were whisked away from their drinks in the offices of SLM-Maneklal, a Bombay-based company representing West European industrial equipment manufacturers.

One of them was Coomar Narain, the firm's liaision officer and the man who eventually was to be branded as the mastermind behind the operation. His drinking companion that night and a frequent visitor to the office was P. Gopalan, a personal assistant in the office of the principal secretary, P. C. Alexander, and a man with access to some of the Government's most sensitive files.

By the time Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, pre-empting parliamentary probing, made a terse announcement to incredulous members in both houses of parliament on January 18 that some persons holding "sensitive positions" had been arrested for indulging in "anti-national activities", the lid had been blown. Bolley was asked to leave the country by the first available flight, giving immediate rise to intense speculation over what exactly the French connection had been. But the Indian connections were more frightening. The list included T.N. Kher, private secretary to P.C. Alexander; S.Shankaran, senior assistant to the President's press secretary; A.K. Malhotra and Uday Chand, both assistants in the prime minister's secretariat; Jagdish Tiwari, senior assistant in the department of economic affairs and J.C. Arora, personal assistant in the office of the secretary for defence production. At least 15 others were picked up for questioning, all government employees working in key ministries.

Bolley was a popular man, witty and urbane, and a familiar face in Delhi's diplomatic circles. But for the last two months he had been constantly shadowed in an attempt to define the contours of an extensive espionage ring operating in the most sensitive offices of the Indian Government.

More spice was added to the sensation with Alexander handing in his resignation "on moral grounds" much like his colleague and close friend R. N.Kao, India's spymaster, had done in the wake of Mrs Gandhi's assassination. Unlike Kao, Alexander is unlikely to be reassigned any advisory post. It was from his office that a majority of the top secret documents, copies of which were found in the raids, had been leaked and two members of his personal staff, Kher and Gopalan, are believed by investigating authorities to be the key members of the ring.

However sensational the cast of characters, individually they hardly qualified for the popular image of espionage agents or even moles. They were something out of John Le Carre, faceless, unassuming men who, except for the sensitive nature of their positions, were easily lost in the anonymity of the impersonal bureaucratic machine. man of medium height and built whom his colleagues describe as a plodder. He has an unblemished record in his 15 years of government service and his only apparent weakness is that he is a heavy smoker and is partial to liquor. He has two sons and a daughter. One of his sons works in the Gulf and the other is an engineer in a private firm. He used to commute to work on his two-wheeled scooter from his modest house in Pamposh Enclave and had a limited social life. However, in the last two months, surveillance teams had on several occasions photographed him with long-range infra-red cameras on his increasing visits to the Hailey Road office of Coomar Narain. The most intriguing element is that Kher's life-style, like most of the others involved, showed no dramatic changes even though investigating sleuths say that the network had been in active operation since 1982. Apart from incriminating documents, none of the government servants arrested were in possession of any large sums of cash or had abnormal bank accounts.

Gopalan, the other key figure, lived in equally modest surroundings in a government flat in R.K. Puram. His family expressed genuine disbelief at the thought of him being a spy but refused to speak any further. Neighbours say he lived a quiet, anonymous life. "All we knew was that he worked in the PM's secretariat and carried some influence," said one.

SIMILAR sentiments were expressed by neighbours of Jagdish Chand Arora, personal assistant to M.C. Sarin, the secretary, defence production. His wife, their two school-going children, an elderly mother and two brothers, who all live together, are still in a state of shock. Arora, they say, was woken up at 12.30 in the early hours of January 17 and taken away by men in mufti. They presumed he was required for official business till they read the screaming headlines in the papers the next day.

Narain, the suspected main link in the espionage chain, was hardly a James Bond type either (see box). The only non-official member of the ring, he has a double-storeyed house in Defence Colony where he lives on the top floor with a Japanese tenant occupying the lower half. He also has a farmhouse in Mehrauli on the outskirts of the city where his wife and two daughters live. Both places, say investigating officials, are legitimately acquired and were within his means to afford. He was earning around Rs 7,000 a month, including perks, from Maneklal. The raids conducted on his houses produced a total of Rs 30,000 in cash which was actually the rent he collected from his tenant. However, a sum of Rs 1.10 lakh was seized from the Hailey Road office and Narain is believed to have told his interrogators that the money was given to him by the company for entertaining, though company spokesmen have denied it. Narain's tax consultant, P. Thomas, expressed amazement at his client's involvement in the spy ring. "It seems impossible that a simple and quiet man like Narain could be involved in something like this," he says.

P.C. ALEXANDER

Heavy Price

SOME lessons must be learnt the hard way, and this one on the dangers of over-centralising government functioning had a particularly heavy price on it. With the espionage network penetrating right into the prime minister's secretariat and into the office of the principal secretary to the prime minister, attention was focused as never before on what exactly went through that office.

The chastening answer was: practically everything. Given his job definition, it was P.C. Alexander's job to coordinate the activities of the Government's various arms, prepare daily briefs for the prime minister, be the staging point for the periodic reports from intelligence agencies of every hue, vet proposals for international agreements, commercial deals, defence purchases, industrial licences and collaborations, and key appointments.

As if that were not enough, Alexander was also on the Atomic Energy Commission and the Space Commission, and therefore had with him in his office papers relating to two of the country's most sensitive departments. Also, in the four years that he had worked in South Block, Alexander had chaired the meetings of over 50 inter-ministerial committees or secretaries' committees appointed to submit reports on such specific issues as the Punjab and Assam problems, to review public sector undertakings, to improve the country's telecommunications system, and much else. For any spy who got in there, Alexander's office could theoretically provide enough information to keep a whole department busy analysing it back at home-base.

On top of everything else, the prime minister's secretariat handled papers relating to a dozen departments directly under the prime minister's charge. These included: science and technology, environment, external affairs, electronics, ocean development and the cabinet secretariat itself, apart from atomic energy and space. Even though proposals on most of these subjects were frequently referred to South Block for

Narain, however, was in possession of evidence that will be crucial to the case against him—documents stamped Top Secret that contain vital and sensitive information. Investigators have established that Narain was the key to the entire operation and that the Hailey Road office was its nerve-centre. Narain, according to intelligence sources, had recruited most of the key members of the ring through Gopalan, whom he had known earlier, having worked with him in the commerce ministry in the '50s. They used to pay frequent visits to Narain's office which was ideally located. Hailey Road is a quiet street with mainly residential buildings. Narain's office consisted of three rooms located on one side of the building which was not visible from the main road. Says S.M.Aggarwal, the building's owner: "I used to observe vehicles coming to and fro till all hours of the night but I never paid any real attention." The documents brought by the visitors were photocopied at a shop in the basement of Rohit House in nearby Tolstoy Marg. The shop owner, a Mr Sharma, refused to comment beyond saying: "I have given my statement to the police". But his is just one of the many photostat shops that have sprung up in the area which stay open till late at night.

However, the documents seized—almost 600 in number according to one source —would seem to indicate that the spy ring was operating on the wafer-thin line that separates the acquisition of a nation's secrets for straight espionage and inside knowledge acquired for business dealings and the selling of expensive and nothing more than a formal okay, there were also the odd occasions when the prime minister's office questioned or reversed proposals that came in. And clearly it would provide the vital inside track for anyone who had access to information that revealed the thought processes of the people in South Block. One illustrative case where Alexander played a key role concerned the Oil and Natural Gas Commission's controversial contract with Ferranti for installing computerised monitoring terminals at some of its installations. It was Alexander who persuaded Mrs Gandhi to order a fresh inquiry into the subject before making a final decision.

Alexander had also become a key advisor on matters that were not directly related to secretarial functioning, as had P.N.Haksar before him. Thus, he and Cabinet Secretary C.R.Krishnaswamy Rao Saheb were consulted by Rajiv Gandhi about the composition of the new Council of Ministers.

Not surprisingly, then, the biggest shock of last fortnight was the fact that Alexander's private secretary, T.N. Kher, and his two personal assistants had been nabbed on espionage charges. While hard information available on what exactly had leaked out was still patchy, the possibilities boggled the mind. And it seemed almost natural that Alexander should promptly resign on moral grounds. Indeed, the resignation upheld the highest traditions of public service in a country where those at the helm habitually failed to accept the responsibility for misdeeds and mishaps and did not resign. Nevertheless, the Alexander episode took on intriguing aspects as the days wore on, and quickly gained the status of a side-show to the main drama.

FOR ONE thing, why had only Alexander resigned, and not the Secretary for Defence Production, M.C. Sarin, or the Additional Secretary in the Finance Ministry, J.S.Baijal, or any of the other officers whose personal staff had been implicated in the spy scandal? For another, why was it that only Alexander had not been informed in advance about the impending arrests, while several others down to middle-level rungs had been warned in advance? It seemed almost ignoble that a civil servant with 36 years of distinguished service behind him should be attending a cabinet committee meeting on the anti-defection bill while the police were registering a case against his aides at the Tilak Marg police station a couple of kilometres from South Block.

And finally, why did a veiled campaign of insinuation against Alexander start shortly after he resigned? While no firm answers were forthcoming, the indications pointed to in-house intrigue and the settling of past scores.

The sequence of events indicated that while it was Alexander himself who had warned the various agencies about the objectionable activities of quite a few people in his secretariat and in other offices, he was not informed about the action taken subsequently. Indeed, some intelligence agency sources indicated that Alexander himself had been under close surveillance, even though it should have been obvious that he was in the clear.

While Alexander put a brave face on events, refusing to show any signs of hurt when a few secretaries to the Government called on him individually, there was little doubt that he was unhappy at the manner in which his name was sought to be dragged into the espionage question. Rajiv Gandhi's issuing of a clean chit to him in Parliament "he was not connected with anything" came only later.

As with so much else concerning the biggest spy scandal in the country's history, there were no clear answers emerging on the vital questions. And one senior government official concluded that someone wanted to embarrass him, so he quit. If that is indeed the case, it added a touch of needless meanness in an already messy situation.

competitive weaponry. According to the investigating authorities, the documents seized represent a smorgasbord of information, some utterly valueless and misleading while others are stamped with the highest secret classification "Not To Go Out Of Office" in red. Investigating sleuths believe that the network was told to lay their hands on anything marked Secret but that could also include information that could prove irreparably damaging for the country's security, both internal and external. As principal secretary, Alexander's office was privy to every move of any importance taken by any of the various ministries (see box). "In Mrs Gandhi's time, specially the last year before her death, the prime minister's office had become all-powerful, reducing many cabinet ministers to irrelevance. All major decisions and every major deal was sent here for clearance. Compared to this case, the Larkins brothers (the earlier spy network busted last year) resemble a couple of erring schoolboys," says a top intelligence source.

IN ATTEMPTING to reconstruct the origins and dimensions of the spy ring, counter-intelligence operatives say that Narain's role was central to the entire operation. As one of the ubiquitous "liaison officers" who have sprung up like weeds in every crack of the Government edifice, Narain's basic job for Maneklal was to cultivate influential government contacts. He was hired by them in 1960. The firm has collaborations with firms in Switzerland, West Germany and Japan as well as with two French companies—Tecalemit Flexibles for manufacturing flexible hoses, Burton Corblin for making piston-type compressors and also represents the French firm of PCM Pomp Moineau. The firm's present head, Yogesh Maneklal told INDIA TODAY that Narain's job was solely liaison work "and to organise the visits of our foreign collaborators visiting Delhi to help them in meeting people in government, and he also helped the firm in following up on industrial licences applied for".

Narain, like others of his calling, operated in that twilight world also inhabited by arms dealers where the activities are not strictly above board as in, for instance, the finding out of bids and specifications of rival competitors. In the process, what started off as industrial information-gathering gradually got diverted into espionage at the urging, for hitherto unknown considerations, of Colonel Alain Bolley. Surveillance photographs offer conclusive proof that Bolley and Narain used to meet clandestinely at tourist spots like the Qutab Minar where the information Narain had obtained from his carefully-cultivated network of government contacts was passed on.

But that brings up the puzzle of the intriguing French Connection. Who were Bolley's masters? French intelligence? Or

COOMAR NARAIN

Unlikely Spy

FOR THOSE who knew him, news of the involvement of Coomar Narain in the sensational spy drama has been received with shocked surprise. For the last 15 years, he has been staying in Defence Colony which also houses a number of retired service officers. One of them who introduced Narain to the Defence Colony Club says he used to see him every morning on his way to work but they only greeted each other. Narain hardly visited the club and generally lived a quiet life.

Even his neighbour, Mrs Kashyap says: "We hardly knew anything about him." He was also a member of the Gymkhana Club where a lot of top bureaucrats and serving defence officers are members. But despite that attraction, Narain hardly visited the club except for a couple of occasions when he was seen lunching by himself.

The Narain family originally hails from Palghat in Kerala where Coomar's grandfather had a house. But they sold their property in the '50s and moved to Madras from where they moved to Cochin before finally settling in Delhi. In Delhi, Coomar occupied the Defence Colony house while his wife and two adopted teenaged daughters lived on the farm he had bought in Mehrauli on the outskirts of the city.

Mrs Narain is probably the most surprised by the shocking revelations about her husband. "On that day, he came to the farm for lunch at 2 p.m. as was his daily routine. He then rested for a while before going back to the office. He normally gave me a ring before going to bed but this time he never called. His servant came to the farm the next morning and said that he hadn't come home. I rushed to the house and only then learnt that he had been arrested." She is absolutely convinced that he is innocent and has been framed. "He never mentioned anything about any of the other people mentioned in the case. I am sure it is a horrible mistake," she says.

was he a maverick moonlighting for the CIA as some reports have suggested? In an interview with French television from New Delhi just before leaving, Bolley flatly rejected the charge that he was working for the CIA. "No French diplomat would work for an American intelligence agency," he stated.

Reports from Paris, where Bolley is being kept under tight wraps, say that Bolley could be the 'victim' of an insidious campaign conducted by jealous competitors. The immediate suspect is the Soviet Union, which, according to this theory, was concerned at Rajiv Gandhi's ostensibly reflexive pro-West tendencies and is striving to sabotage his plans of unbolting protected Indian markets to western suppliers. The theory goes that the Soviets specifically wished to wreck the massive Rs 2,000 crore 155mm gun deal which the French were hopeful of bagging. Bolley had played a key role in the negotiations. But what is equally obvious is that, considering the "special relationship" built up between India and France in the last couple of years, the Indian Government would hardly declare Bolley persona non grata unless there was incontrovertible evidence of his involvement.

Till the current controversy, Bolley's credentials were impeccable. He graduated in 1955 from the Aviation School at Salon-De-Provence in the specialised branch of the engineer-officer corps of the French Air Force. In 1975, he completed a course in higher military studies which qualified him for foreign assignments. In 1977, he became an air force colonel and was posted to New Delhi in July, 1980 as deputy defence attache.

HOWEVER, as with most other embassies, there is almost always an agent of the French external intelligence agency, the DGSE-K (Direction Generale De La Securite Exterieure, formerly the SDECE), the French equivalent of the CIA, and he often operates under the cover of a military attache. Since the socialist government took over, the agency's brief has been towards gathering more economic, financial and scientific information. France's arms sales pitch is legendary and a military attache has a pivotal role to play in a client country.

Bolley fits the frame to perfection. He had done invaluable groundwork for the French in their major arms deals with India in the last four years, including those for the Mirage 2000 fighter, and the Matra Magic 550 and Milan missiles. It is also in the last four years that the French need for defence-related information has escalated dramatically. France has become the world's third largest supplier of conventional arms largely because of its laissez faire attitude to arms sales. With most of the lions of the French arms industry having been nationalised, it is far more accurate to speak of the existence of a "military-industrial complex" in France than it is in the US.

The promotion of arms sales is also subject to this symbiotic relationship between industry and the state. The state has become the principal purveyor of French arms. Thus, Bolley's role in the entire affair has a strange sort of logic. Indian intelligence sources also say that one of the reasons why the French had been so successful with their arms sales to India was because they had access to crucial information on what Indian defence requirements and specifications were in advance. The successes include:

► The Rs 1,200-crore Mirage 2000 deal for the supply of 40 aircraft which makes India the single largest customer at Mehrauli say that the Narains hardly did any entertaining or had a hectic social life which is quite contrary to the reports of wild orgies that appeared in some sections of the press. Says Ranbir Singh, who sold Narain the three-and-a-half acre farm: "Whenever I met Narain, he was very friendly and polite.

Narain's wife at their farm

There were no parties or anything at the farmhouse that would possibly suggest he was not what he seemed."

Narain started his career as a stenographer in the foreign ministry. He was posted abroad in China for a year immediately after his marriage in 1955. On his return, he worked in the finance and commerce ministries where he first came in contact with Gopalan. In 1960, he quit government service and joined Maneklal and Company. Yogesh Maneklal says that Narain was hired by his father and he really has no idea as to his activities in Delhi. Neither, for that matter, does Narain's driver Rameshwar. "I used to drive him all over the city but I did not find anything suspicious in his activities. He was a good man." Intelligence surveillance, however, has established that Narain used taxis to meet Bolley. Meanwhile, two of his office assistants have been picked up for questioning about his activities in the Hailey Road office and the kind of people he used to meet in his mysterious incarnation as a master spy.

The Mirage 2000 firing a Matra Magic 550 missile: key contracts for the aircraft to date.

► Matra Magic 550 missiles, initially linked to the Mirage sale but grew much larger in scale when the Indian Air Force decided to integrate the Matra system with its MiG-21 bis and MiG-23 Flogger B aircraft. The deal is still to be finalised but could involve as much as 10,000 missiles.

► Milan anti-tank missiles. The deal for an unspecified number of missiles was signed against considerable opposition and opinions are still divided on the wisdom of the choice.

► The French were also leading the field in the race for the 155mm gun deal which was due to be signed shortly. The requirement is for 600 pieces as outright purchase with the provision to manufacture much more indigenously.

In addition, the defence forces have been buying crores worth of smaller components like electronic aids, radar equipment, precision ammunition and surveillance equipment including that sought to be used to convert Air India Boeing 707s into AWACS aircraft.

In the light of the successes in the past, it is obvious that Bolley was being pressed for more new information when at least two major orders, involving close to Rs 3,000 crore, were in the final stages of decision. Last fortnight, Lt-General J.R. Malhotra, who heads the Corps of Artillery in the Indian army, told the press that a final decision had almost been taken on the purchase of the 155 mm calibre howitzer to replace the second world war vintage 25-pounders. The French firm OFEMA was competing for the Rs 2,000-crore order with the Austrians and Swedes. In fact in such a sensitive stage was the deal now that, in spite of the panic in the wake of the arrests, Colonel Joel Lesne, OFEMA's technical delegate in Delhi refused to leave, though he firmly declined to talk to INDIA TODAY. Along with the artillery guns, at stake now was the sale of a Rs 1,000-crore integrated computer system for the joint use of the three services.

INTELLIGENCE sources say Bolley and, in turn his men, were under pressure to find out more, and quickly, to back the French claims to these deals and in the rush made some mistakes. "They did fail to cover their tracks and did not even seem bothered to look behind their backs as we trailed them," said an intelligence agent.

But even against that background, intelligence sources are unable to explain the wide range of confidential information that Bolley was getting which was quite unconnected to his, or his country's requirements. In fact, when Indian counter-intelligence first realised that highly classified information was being leaked out, it was in connection with Pakistan. In September last year, prominent US newspapers reported Indian plans to stage a pre-emptive strike against Pakistan's nuclear facility at Kahuta. The reports were based on leaks from a US senate sub-committee meeting. The meeting was held when Pakistan foreign minister Sahibzada Yakub Khan was in Washington.

The Indian intelligence sensors were quick to pick up the trails of the international campaign as Khan went around giving off-the-record interviews to the American Press, complaining about the Indian designs on Kahuta and the Pakistani plans for retaliation. "Madam may just do it one of these days," he told a group of Washington newsmen one afternoon, adding menacingly, "and in that case what alternative will we have except to strike at Tarapur? And then Madam Gandhi will face the prospect of having to evacuate 10 million people out of Bombay." To Indian officers it was clear that there was an obvious design to the campaign and both the Pakistanis and the Americans had access to confidential information.

Other clues had also surfaced. Defence officers going abroad for negotiations reported surprise at the extent of information prospective western manufacturers, specially the French, seemed to have on Indian defence requirements.

These days the task of choosing a computer is as complex as the number of options the market offers. But you've got a choice: work your way through the maze of product claims or come to the No 1: WIPRO. Here's the case of a leading automobile manufacturer who made the right choice...

The challenge: Production planning that involved the control of 2,500 components, fed from internal production lines and over 200 vendors.

The solution: WIPRO's customized, totally integrated Production Planning and Control package to run on a powerful WIPRO mini-computer.

The outcome: The WIPRO solution helped the manufacturer quicken response time and speed up information flow between Stores, Production and Purchase departments. And monitored day-to-day receipts, issues, returns and rejections. Totally eliminating stock-outs and over-stocking.

If your problem was as complex as this, wouldn't you be concerned about the right move, too?

Break away to the No 1 in mini-computers. In 1983-84, with almost twice the sales of No 2, WIPRO captured 30% of the market in mini-computers. An achievement confirmed in a survey by Data Quest*, where WIPRO emerged as the undisputed leader.

And what's behind WIPRO's No 1 position?

WIPRO's support service. WIPRO can offer customer services countrywide, through a well-planned network of offices. Backed by a qualified and experienced team of hardware and software specialists and service engineers.

WIPRO's customer interaction. A close working relationship with users helps WIPRO develop customized solutions.

WIPRO's product range. Today WIPRO has the widest range of mini-computers with features such as upgradability to meet a user's growing needs. The software developed by WIPRO is compatible across the entire range of its systems.

WIPRO's R&D. Complementing the state-of-the-art inputs in WIPRO's R&D environment is a team of experienced, qualified and dedicated personnel. Helping pioneer and develop systems with the leading edge of technology.

WIPRO's modern factory. WIPRO's factory in Mysore has the most modern manufacturing and testing equipment. The Fairchild ATE, for example—the only one of its kind in India.

information that was highly classified and could only have come from informants in highly-placed Indian circles. The clincher came when Sri Lanka produced secret reports about the involvement of RAW in the training camps set up by separatist guerrillas in Tamil Nadu.

By late September, it was obvious that the leaks were emanating from the prime minister's secretariat as well as the defence ministry. Surveillance had already indicated the involvement of Narain, Bolley and government officials like Kher and Gopalan. Says an intelligence official: "We had to proceed very carefully because the prime minister's office was involved and we were not sure just how many others there were."

BUT IT was only when prime minister Rajiv Gandhi finally gave them the green signal for the crackdown, that the real extent of the leaks became known. Intelligence sources say that they are now faced with a dual problem, one more formidable than the other. The exact dimensions of the spy ring are yet to be fully traced and investigating officials do not rule out the possibility of further arrests or the involvment of other senior government officials. The other problem is that so far Indian counter intelligence has mainly concentrated on keeping tabs on Pakistan, Chinese and American personnel in India suspected of espionage activities. The Colonel Bolley affair has now made it clear that western European personnel are equally active in obtaining classified information and with their slender resources the Intelligence Bureau will be hard-pressed to cope with the additional pressure.

There is also a third problem: that of plugging the leaks that have already occurred. Among the documents seized were copies of the Intelligence Bureau's Daily Summary of Intelligence (DSI) and Weekly Reports (WR) which also contained information on strategic states like Punjab and Assam. Last fortnight, the IB set up a special cell headed by Additional Director M.K.Narayanan with six deputy directors (of the rank of deputy inspector-general of police) to examine the extent of the leaks. Sources, however, say that it will be weeks before the information is collated, assessed centrally and firm conclusions drawn. Former RAW chief R.N. Kao, who resigned after Mrs Gandhi's assassination, is back in his old Cabinet Secretariat office and is also associated with the investigation. He has also reportedly roped in his protege and successor Shankaran Nair to assist in the assessment.

The current spy drama has also succeeded in laying bare the gaping holes in the country's security set-up. The security clearance procedures for people in sensitive posts is extremely ill-defined and lax.Normally, government servants are appointed after a police clearance which merely involves the local police special branch sending a junior officer to the applicant's locality to verify his antecedents. Only on specific orders from the Government is further background investigation conducted.But even then, the object has a very limited purpose —to ensure that the applicant does not have a criminal past or connections with "objectionable" political groups. The intelligence agencies, on the other hand, have a limited cell which keeps tabs on their own operatives.

The 155 mm howitzer gun: crucial deal

In the case of the handling of classified material, there is a Secretariat Manual which prescribes the procedures for classification of files and who is entitled to have access to them.There are seven classifications of sensitive files which are:

Official Circulation; Restricted Circulation; Confidential; Secret; Top Secret; For Your Eyes Only; Not To Go Out Of Office.

However, though the manual also specifies the people who are permitted access to the various categories of files, it was observed more in the breach. Personal staff of senior bureaucrats, specially trusted people like Kher and Gopalan who had been in the same office for years on end, routinely handle classified files. The principal secretary has it in his power to send for any file he wants without any questions being asked.In the last few months, with the Punjab extremists, Operation Bluestar and Mrs Gandhi's assassination, the flow of files to Alexander's office had become a veritable flood.

What made things easier for the moles was the fact that owing to the Indian Government's abnormal obsession with secrecy, even routine and comparatively unimportant letters and documents, specially relating to defence, were stamped Secret. It would be logical to assume that virtually every second file that passed through the office of the principal secretary would have been similarly stamped. The sheer volume of such files would have made it quite impossible to keep in step with security procedures.

The leaks from the nation's highest secretariat have inevitably brought renewed attention on the agencies whose business it is to prevent such leaks in the first place. "We do not want to detract from the fine work the IB has done. But the fact of the matter is that this ring was operating for nearly two years and we knew nothing about it. What would have been our fate if India had to go to war with another country during this period?" queries a senior intelligence official. Intelligence sources, however, confirm that they wanted to move in on the ring in early December but the ruling party preferred to wait till

COLONEL ALAIN BOLLEY

The French Connection

IF THE latest spy scandal to rock the country is an endless series of riddles, the most complicated of them all is the central character in the drama, Colonel Alain Bolley. The key question before Indian intelligence men still is: what were his real motivations, and who was he working for? Was he a member of the French secret service, the SDECE (Service de Documentation Exterieure et de Contre-Espionage) or was he a case of "false flag recruitment" by the CIA? Or was he working on his own, on behalf of the French arms manufacturers, all for a kickback?

Initially an engineering graduate of Ecole Superieure de Electrits, he had an uneventful six-year service in the French air force before getting his first foreign posting to Morocco. And then came the most controversial phase of his career—service in Algeria at the height of the terror unleashed by the OAS (Organisation De L'Arm Secrete), the organisation of hawkish French ex-serviceman who found Algerian independence unacceptable.

Significantly, it was also during this period that Service Five, as the dirty-tricks wing of the SDECE is designated, was most active in Algeria. Its agents were taught demolition, assassination, kidnapping, torture and sabotage and many were posted in Algeria under cover of jobs in diplomatic missions. These men known as Barbuzes were hated for their brutality.

Apart from his Algerian posting and a vague service record in the air force, another factor pointing to Bolley's special upbringing, according to intelligence officers, is his rather remarkable linguistic talent. New Delhi's diplomats recall with a fair bit of awe his fluency in English, German and Japanese. At parties he was much sought-after for his rather colourful expressions that often turned vicious while talking of things like French socialism and Eurocommunism. Intelligence men are also studying the pattern of his travels in India. In 1981, he visited Mussoorie on a three-day holiday with his wife Brigitte, and then proceeded on a conducted tour of the various defence establishments in the east including the 39 Gorkha Training Centre (GTC) at Varanasi, the Eastern Army Command headquarters at Fort William in Calcutta, India Air Force bases and naval installations at Bagdogra, Puri, Konarak and the Garden Reach Workshop.

He followed it up the next year with visits to the Hindustan Aeronautics Ltd (HAL) plants at Hyderabad and Bangalore, the naval base at Cochin and the College of Military Engineering and the Indian Military Academy in Pune. Later he went around scouring Ladakh with halts at Kargil, Leh, and Padam. Sigficantly, in 1983 when the Mirage deal was in its final stages, he more or less stayed put in Delhi. Counter-espionage agents are now trying to interpret the likely significance of his three-week visit to Paris between August and September, 1984. The French Embassy, however, says that he had merely gone on leave.

> "The French secret service seems to have become something of a state within a state, operating almost entirely outside the laws of the French Republic."
> MICHAEL TREGENZA

Indian officers find it difficult to believe that the French, with such high stakes in maintaining good relations with this country would make the mistake of unleashing their espionage agencies in India, a country that is of marginal strategic interest to them. "It sounds so unreal," said an Indian officer, "that the French will take the risk of penetrating the Indian Prime Minister's Secretariat merely for the sake of helping their arms manufacturers make more money." But there is another school of thought that feels that the bagging of these key orders in India is so vital for the survival of certain sections of the French armament industry today that the Government might well have decided to get into the act.

Similar confusion prevails regarding the origins of the plot. Logically, it seems extremely unlikely that a French intelligence officer would work for the Americans because SDECE has a long history of animosity with the CIA and FBI. This, in fact began in the mid-'60s with the defection to America of M.de Vesjoli, the man heading the American section in the SDECE. Ever since then, the CIA and the SDECE have been engaged in a slanging match. But, while this background rules out the possibility of an SDECE man helping the Americans, it leaves the field wide open for the penetration of the French services by the CIA.

Besides, sources point out, in France the intelligence agencies are known to often act on their own, without the sanction of the Government. The SDECE, particularly, is known to be a law unto itself and has even been involved in large-scale drug-peddling to raise money for its covert activities. For example:

- In 1971 Colonel Paul Fournier, the number two man in SDECE, was caught with heroin worth Rs 8 crore at Newark, New Jersey, in the US. He later confessed that he was working on behalf of one of the directors of French intelligence.
- In Haiti, an SDECE agent was caught with 106 kg of heroin. Around the same time, in the seventies, the organisation was accused of circulating and using counterfeit currency.

The French Government has apparently found it impossible to keep an effective control over its intelligence agencies, and as Michael Tregenza, an acknowledged authority on European espionage systems states, "the French secret service seems to have become something of a state within a state operating almost entirely outside the laws of the French Republic and beyond governmental control".

This, and Bolley's intriguing background open endless possibilities. And with Bolley disappearing from the scene, Indian intelligence men are extremely pessimistic about the possibility of ever solving the riddle. They are, indeed, resigned to waiting till the present investigations produce some of the answers to the jigsaw puzzle, or perhaps till Colonel Alain Bolley, Legion d' Honneur, decides to write his memoirs.

after the elections to get more information on its dimensions and also avoid any pre-electoral embarrassment.

That the network operated for so long and with impunity is also indicative of the limitations of the country's counter-intelligence set-up. Even after the Larkins case last year, no significant effort was made to beef up security procedures and the IB's counter-intelligence wing still continues to be dangerously short of vehicles, funds and personnel. In addition, the IB is also saddled with the increasing threat of international terrorism. There have been alerts in the recent past about Middle East terrorist groups sneaking into India and of Indian terrorists making contacts with foreign terrorist groups.

Such a situation also lends credence to the suspicion in certain intelligence circles that the original tip-off regarding the spy ring was actually given to RAW by the Soviet counter-espionage agency, the KGB. The KGB with its greater resources and massive network of operatives would have had Bolley's name on their files as an intelligence agent and would certainly have maintained their own surveillance on his activities as they do on all intelligence operatives from the western embassies based in Delhi. In fact, it is still widely believed in intelligence circles that the original tipoff about the Larkins spy set-up had also come from the KGB who had stumbled across it while keeping routine surveillance on the CIA agents the Larkins were meeting.

RAGHU RAI

Investigating officials discussing the case outside court (top) and R.N. Kao

The Soviets would, in fact, have been bagging two birds with a single stone. Since the late '70s, they have been getting increasingly worried about losing their monopoly on arms supplies to India to western arms sources. A majority of India's biggest arms deals since 1980 has been with the West, particularly Britain and France, a situation that had led to the sudden proliferation of arms dealers and representatives of western arms manufacturers. Since the Larkins affair, their access to the Defence Ministry and the headquarters of the three service arms had been drastically curtailed. Now, after the Bolley affair, there is bound to be a further tightening up on security procedures with regard to non-official visits to sensitive government departments. The ones who will profit most from that would undoubtedly be the Soviets.

Last fortnight, the prime minister summoned the top-ranking intelligence officials for a review of the intelligence set-up and the possibilities of revamping them to make them more effective. A reappraisal was also made of the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) with regard to external and internal intelligence. Over the years, the JIC's seem to have become more and more ineffective mainly because of the lack of coordination and cooperation between the various intelligence agencies. Sources say that the JIC's have become forums for slanging matches where internal feuds and inter-service rivalry rather than common concerns are predominant.

Intelligence veterans, however, say that the moment is ripe for major changes in intelligence strategy and doctrine. Says one: "It is high time we became more aggressive and result-oriented. We should have better interaction with agencies of friendlier countries, something which is not encouraged at the moment." But change seems to be anathema to the intelligence agencies and it will require a concerted effort from the very highest levels to bring it about. Till then, however, Coomar Narain's breed can continue to sell the country down the drain with little fear of being found out.

ASSEMBLY ELECTIONS

An Unequal Battle

IT SEEMED to be a calculated move to consolidate the Congress(I)'s supremacy over its political foes. Last fortnight, the ruling party advanced the assembly polls by three months, clearly to give the battered Opposition yet another drubbing. With a pro-Congress(I) wave generated in the wake of Mrs Gandhi's brutal assassination showing no sign of decline, 10 Congress(I) state governments approached the Election Commission to hold the assembly elections in March instead of June 1985 when their five-year terms were to expire. Having armed himself with the state governments' approval, R.K. Trivedi, the bespectacled election commissioner, announced in a hurriedly convened press conference on January 24: "Countdown for the second general elections within 10 weeks has begun from today."

It is indeed going to be a mini general election. According to Election Commission notifications, the state assemblies of Bihar, Uttar Pradesh, Himachal Pradesh, Orissa, Maharashtra, Rajasthan, Karnataka, Andhra Pradesh, Sikkim, Madhya Pradesh and the Union territory of Pondicherry will go to the polls on March 2 and 5 this year. Nearly 270 million of the country's voters will elect 2,534 of the total 3,997 MLA's in all the assemblies. In fact, it is for the first time since 1967 that so many assembly elections are being held so soon after the Lok Sabha poll. Even then, both elections were held after a gap of about six months.

Said G.K. Moopanar, general secretary of the All-India Congress Committee(I): "In all these states, the Congress(I) was the ruling party and we have decided to seek a fresh mandate from the people for strengthening the hands of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi." He added that if the Lok Sabha verdict was a vote for integrity and stability, the assembly election result would in turn be an affirmation of the new leadership and cordial Centre-state relations.

Obviously the major consideration for an early poll was the ruling party's conviction that any delay would not only give the Opposition a chance to recover from the shock but would lead to a massive decline in the pro-Rajiv wave blowing all over the country. Though the party has majorities in at least half the 11 assemblies, and two-thirds majority in Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan, Orissa, Gujarat and Maharashtra, a section of the party is of the opinion that the Congress(I) will not be able to repeat its earlier performance if the elections were held as scheduled in June 1985.

In fact, the decision to go in for elections was taken after a detailed study of the results of the assembly segments in the Lok Sabha elections. According to these results, the ruling party led over opposition candidates in over 2,100 assembly segments in these 11 states. The party high command also collected information through government intelligence agencies about the mood of the electorate, and all of them echoed that any delay in holding elections would erode the party's base in states like Bihar, Uttar Pradesh, Karnataka and Maharashtra. Following a consensus among the central leaders, the Congress(I) decided to direct even those reluctant chief ministers like Arjun Singh of Madhya Pradesh, Chandrashekhar Singh of Bihar and Madhavsinh Solanki of Gujarat to go for a March poll. The high command even conceded the request of Himachal Pradesh Chief Minister Virbhadra Singh for dissolving the state assembly 27 months before its term was to expire in 1987. Boasted Singh: "We have a leader with a clean image, a party with a record of service and an army of young and committed workers. Why not use these favourable factors in our favour?"

Singh and his party colleagues were convinced that victory was certain, and they would have to merely go through the ritual of polling in March. Their hopes were based on the massive rush for Congress(I) tickets. Before the deadline for receiving applications closed on January 25, the dozen Pradesh Congress Committees(I)'s (PCCI's) had collected over Rs 1 crore as fees from 20,000 of the 80,000 prospective MLA's. The rush was so much that the party bosses had to summon the police in Maharashtra, Gujarat and Uttar Pradesh to keep the mobs under control.

Not only were the PCC(I) presidents and the AICC(I) office-bearers forced to find hide-outs to rest after the sleepless nights they had spent, they even had to seek police protection to move about unmolested. For instance, Union Finance Minister and Uttar Pradesh Congress(I) Committee President Vishwanath Pratap Singh spent four nights away from home to avoid the over 2,000 ticket-seekers who had descended on his three-bedroom Kailash Colony apartment in New Delhi. In Maharashtra, AICC(I) observer Tarun Gagoi was surrounded by a rush at Sahyadiri Guest House, and Chief Minister Vasantdada Patil could not leave New Delhi's Maharashtra Sadan for his appointment with the Central leaders till he had accepted applications from all the waiting party workers. All the state government bhavans in New Delhi were bursting at the seams and over 40 state ministers were put up at New Delhi's five-star hotels.

Obviously believing that the important factor for selection would be the candidates' knowledge of modern gadgetry and equipment, over 20,000 Congressmen had typed their applications on electronic typewriters, and about 5,000 of them had written that they were young, educated and familiar with "modern approaches to administration". A candidate from Uttar Pradesh declared in his application form: "I have never faced any corruption charges in my political life. Flying and collection of electronic gadgets are my important hobbies."

Confronted with a deluge of applications, the Congress(I) had the daunting task of selecting only 2,500-odd candidates out of over 80,000 applications—all of them claiming to be clean, young and efficient. The Congress Working Committee (CWC) which met last fortnight, however, decided that only clean, experienced candidates with winning chances would be given a ticket. Said V.P. Singh: "We have decided to give more representation to youth and women and we will drop all those against whom there are serious charges of indiscipline and corruption. We want to build a party of Rajivji's liking."

The decision to weed out "unclean" MLA's was taken following a series of confidential reports sent by 438 coordinators appointed by the Development Centre of the ruling party. The centre, a part of Indian Youth Congress(I) (IYC-I), was launched in 1983 when Rajiv was looking after the frontal organisations. As part of the strategy, the IYC(I) appointed nominally paid coordinators throughout the country to provide a feed-back to Rajiv about the development activities, the image of the local MLA's and MP's and any frailties of the state administration. Over 50 MP's were dropped on the basis of adverse reports sent by the youth coordinators. According to Congress(I) sources, this time, too, the coordinators' reports suggested that over 50 per cent of the MLA's do not have a clean image and their renomination would adversely affect the party's poll prospects.

But the party was not depending entirely on these reports. The AICC(I) appointed over 40 observers in all the states along with Pradesh election committees to recommend a panel of names for each of the assembly constituencies. The scrutiny of the names began on January 28, when the central parliamentary board began its marathon meeting of selecting candidates. Said Murali Bhandari, AICC(I) observer for Uttar Pradesh: "Never before have we found so much dedication, unity and commitment to the leadership as we see now in Uttar Pradesh. Though all of them want to become MLA's, they have assured us that they will abide by the high command's decision."

The leadership is, however, anxious to elect legislators who are not only loyal to the new leadership but are also capable of replacing the old leaders in their states. It was with these objectives that the party's central leadership nominated new young AICC(I) observers and members of various election committees. Though there are no firm indications of this yet, it is clear that a decision regarding at least half the chief ministers of the states going to the polls has already been taken. This will be implemented only after the assembly polls.

THERE were hints, in fact, of an orchestrated campaign against Vasantdada Patil when he was accused publicly by Union Steel and Mines Minister Vasant Sathe of sabotaging his Lok Sabha poll. In Bihar too, supporters of Chief Minister Chandrashekhar Singh and former chief minister Jagannath Mishra continued to trade charges against each other. In both cases, the central leadership has received over half a dozen memoranda against the chief ministers.

The opposition parties are keenly watching which way the nominations will go. With the idea of a one-party opposition with a common symbol and one leader buried for the moment, the opposition strategists are understandably pinning their hopes on the dissensions within the ruling party. Each selection will mean at least 50 rejected candidates, who will, the opposition leaders hope, either work for them or against the Congress(I). The most important factor in the opposition's favour seems to be the absence of formidable state-level Congress(I) leaders. Says BJP leader L.K. Advani: "The political situation is entirely reversed this time. Contrary to the Lok Sabha poll when the Congress(I) could project one leader for the Centre, it can't do so now in any state. While we have a clear leader in each state assembly of Andhra Pradesh, Maharashtra, Karnataka, Gujarat and Orissa, the Congress(I) has none." Madhu Dandavate, leader of the Janata Party parliamentary group is also hopeful. "As compared to the Lok Sabha poll, we now have far better chances. We have a second line of leadership in all the states where the Congress(I) has none," he says.

Though the Opposition as a whole has not evolved a poll strategy to avenge its defeat, it is likely to concentrate on states where it can either win power or give the Congress(I) a reasonable fight. According to sources, opposition parties hope to retain power in both Karnataka and Andhra Pradesh where local issues are likely to dominate the election. In Orissa, Rajasthan, Himachal Pradesh, Bihar, Maharashtra and Madhya Pradesh, the opposition parties, even if divided, are expecting to give the ruling party a run for its money.

It is only in Uttar Pradesh that none of the opposition parties, including Charan Singh's Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party (DMKP) is capable of putting up a respectable fight. Although the DMKP's New Delhi office was the second-most crowded after the Congress(I)—it received over 2,000 applications—its leadership has given up hopes due to what it described as the possibility of "blatant rigging" in the elections. Even the firebrand Akbar Ahmed of the Rashtriya Sanjay Manch predicted over 400 seats to the Congress(I) in the Assembly. Said Akbar: "We will fight the elections. But it is the bureaucracy and police which will ensure the Congress(I)'s successive victory and not the voters. If district magistrates and superintendents of police are with you, you don't need votes. They will be right there in the ballot boxes when they arrive at the counting centres."

The opposition leaders were apparently blowing up the possibility of rigging in the elections to cover up their own failure to project a single issue in the assembly elections. Ahmed's party was talking of crop insurances, job guarantees for the unemployed and the DMKP equally enthusiastically promised remunerative prices for agricultural products, more government expenditure on villages and curbs on capital-intensive industries. None of this seemed to cut much ice with the voters who were used to the 'one slogan-one leader' dominated election campaign.

There were some half-hearted attempts to forge unity around one state leader. For example, the opposition leaders are likely to project Sharad Pawar, Ramakrishna Hegde, N.T. Rama Rao, Babubhai Patel, Biju Patnaik, Bhairon Singh Shekhawat and Shanta Kumar as their chief ministerial candidates in Maharashtra, Karnataka, Andhra Pradesh, Gujarat, Orissa, Rajasthan and Himachal Pradesh. The Opposition is also confident of giving a severe blow to the Congress(I) in Sikkim where Nar Bahadur Bhandari, the ousted chief minister, has proved his invincibility by trouncing the ruling party in the Lok Sabha election.

But none of these parties was willing to concede that it had fared worse than the others in the elections. While the BJP leaders claimed proudly that its candidates were running second in 102 parliamentary constituencies and had polled 7.7 per cent votes, the Janata leaders drew satisfaction from the fact that it was the only non-communist national party to reach a double figure mark in the Lok Sabha. The DMKP claimed adamantly that it was the dominant party in Bihar, Haryana and Uttar Pradesh. Thus it seems that only in Andhra Pradesh and Karnataka, where personalities like NTR and Hegde dominate, the chances of the Opposition unitedly fighting the ruling party are bright.

Yet with their inability to feel the pulse of the people even after a disastrous performance, the opposition parties—barring a last minute miracle—seem to be heading inexorably towards another disaster.

DHIRENDRA BRAHMACHARI

Crash Landing

JUST yesterday he had all the trappings of power and glory. Union ministers fawned ingratiatingly over Dhirendra Brahmachari, the 69-year-old yogi with the hypnotic eyes and astonishing political clout. He could stroll into even the most important government function or ceremony, or drive his gleaming white Mercedes right into the prime minister's residence without security guards stopping him. He flew his own planes, and ran posh air-conditioned yoga ashrams where socialites rubbed sweaty shoulders with the hoi polloi. But today his unexpectedly humiliating tumble into oblivion couldn't be more complete.

Since the change of order at South Block, the yogi has become something of a persona non grata. No ministers hang about his sprawling Vishwayatan Yoga Ashram in New Delhi any more, and neither has he called upon the new prime minister. In fact, the spotless white dhoti-clad figure of the swami was conspicuous by its absence at the swearing-in ceremony of Rajiv Gandhi. And this was the first time since 1967—barring the Janata regime—that he had failed to turn up. As a top Congress(I) functionary says: "Earlier it was clear that only those who were in the good books of Brahmachari were rewarded. But the situation is completely changed now."

Brahmachari's troubles have come in a bunch: he faces a criminal case in Jammu; voluntary donations and government grants to his various charitable and research institutions have plummetted to less than a Rs 1 crore this year from Rs 10 crore in 1981-82; the Government has not extended his income tax exemption: all of this has led to a general financial crisis. The yogi admits: "Our request for extending the period of income tax exemption for donations has been pending for many months. Officers are probably taking their time because Swami Dhirendra Brahmachari is involved." Quite a fall for the late prime minister's trusted confidant.

But none of this happened suddenly. The swami's fortunes began to slide downhill soon after Sanjay Gandhi's death in 1980, only to revive temporarily with Mrs Gandhi's personal intervention, which enabled him to expand his yoga activities. But the swami's ultimate fate was clearly on the cards ever since Rajiv Gandhi began to emerge as the second most powerful force in the Congress(I). Some examples of the swami's decline and fall from grace over the past three years:

1981: Under the stewardship of H.K.L. Bhagat, Union minister of state for information and broadcasting, Doordarshan drops Brahmachari's weekly yoga programme.

1982: The Government rejects

INTERVIEW

"Only those who rise will fall"

FOR DHIRENDRA Brahmachari, the installation of Rajiv Gandhi as the prime minister has marked the beginning of an uncertain future. A regular feature at the former prime minister's house for over three decades, Brahmachari is now suddenly out in the cold. In an exclusive interview with Assistant Editor PRABHU CHAWLA, Brahmachari spoke about his relationship with Rajiv and his future plans. Excerpts:

Q. You were very close to Mrs Indira Gandhi. Do you have the same relationship with Rajiv also?

A. I have good relations with Rajiv also. There is no change in that after he became prime minister.

Q. Have you met him after he took over as prime minister on December 31?

A. Earlier I used to go to the prime minister's residence only when I was summoned. I am not like other politicians who hang around there. It is not a yogic character to call on the politicians just for nothing. I will try to meet Rajiv only if something is very urgent and important. At the moment, none of my work is held up for which I need Rajiv's intervention.

Q. Rajiv has not invited you so far?

A. Maybe there is no work. Moreover I have been dragged into politics. By not meeting me maybe Rajiv wants to show to the world that I am not involved in any politics.

Q. People feel you have fallen from grace and Rajiv doesn't like you?

A. Only those who rise will fall. (Girta to woh hai, jo chadhta hai.) I was never on the top. I just loved that family. I have never been part of the throne, so where is the question of my being thrown out?

Q. You were a regular visitor to the prime minister's house before Mrs Gandhi's death. Didn't Mrs Gandhi try to establish a good relation between you and Rajiv?

A. Rajiv has been in politics for the last four years. I have met him many times but never discussed politics. But Mrs Gandhi was worried about him. With tears in her eyes she told me a few months before her death, she would be killed and wanted her well-wishers to take care of Rajiv. I assured her that I would give every drop of my blood for Rajiv's safety.

> "It is always a bad habit of the people around the king to launch a tirade against a person who is loved by the ruler."

Q. What do you think about Rajiv as prime minister? How is he different from his mother?

A. I have seen Rajiv growing since childhood. He has got qualities. If he runs the administration according to his own judgement and independently, he will be a successful prime minister like his mother. If he is guided by others, he will be doomed.

Q. Has Rajiv proved to be a good prime minister so far?

A. He has the support of the people of India. But the people in the party should not be over-confident after winning 400 seats. They should be careful now. A successful ruler should possess all the qualities of sam (peace), dam (money), dand (power) and bhed (ability to divide his foes). I am confident Rajiv has all of them.

Q. Do you think that he is being dominated by others? Why don't you warn him against this?

A. I can't say anything at the moment because he has not made any move so far. And I am concentrating on my own yoga activities. People will realise the importance of my work and contribution after my death. I can't advise him. You see, it is always a bad habit of the people around the king to launch a tirade against a person who is loved by the ruler.

Q. If you do not get the same respect and recognition from Rajiv which you were getting earlier, what do you intend to do?

A. I don't know his mind yet. Whatever I am doing it is for the country. I have no personal interest. If he doesn't like me, I will go back to the mountains and continue to do my yoga there.

Brahmachari's request for the handing over of land surrounding his Ashok Road ashram for a central yoga research institute.

1983: Brahmachari's informal visits to 1, Safdarjang Road are curbed; he now has to seek prior appointment.

Mid-1983: The Safdarjang aerodrome slaps on a monthly rental of Rs 10,000 for his planes which have so far used the hangars free of cost.

1984: A criminal case is registered against the swami for allegedly assembling imported guns and peddling them in Jammu & Kashmir.

Late 1984: The Government rejects his plea for a 130 per cent income tax exemption on donations to his research projects.

Pushed into a corner both financially and politically, the swami was forced to cut his losses. Out went the prestigious yoga research institute in Jammu, which he had launched with so much fanfare in 1981. For his impressively named Rs 21 crore Department of Physiology at his newly opened Aparna Centre for Scientific Research in Yoga, Brahmachari had intended to sign up a hundred senior scientists and doctors, and import a variety of very sophisticated equipment including computers.

In November 1981, the Union Finance Ministry even granted for a period of seven years, income tax exemptions on donations to the project. With the money that poured in, Brahmachari recruited over a dozen scientists and doctors at handsome salaries, and imported equipment worth over Rs 1 crore. He boasted: "Our centre is the only one in the world doing scientific research on the impact of yoga on the human body. We have developed computerised programmes which can control blood pressure and heart ailments without any medical aid." Indeed, Brahmachari and his associates even had papers published in reputed journals, to their credit.

But all that is gone now. When a controversy blew up over donations by DCM to Brahmachari's institutions, in 1983 the Finance Ministry decided to review the exemption of taxes on donations to the swami's ashrams, among others. Ominously, Brahmachari's annual request for extension of the tax exemption was kept pending. The message was pretty clear to the yogi, who last month began winding up his show. He even sacked 50 of his employees including the scientists. "There's no other option," he said. "If I don't get donations, I can't run my research projects, they're very expensive."

Brahmachari with his plane: grounded

The next to go were his planes: for the past three months, he hasn't flown any of the three he owns, depending instead on the Indian Airlines for his trips to Jammu and elsewhere, like any other mortal. He has sent feelers to friends at home and abroad that he plans to sell off his eight-seater Dornier, originally bought for Sanjay Gandhi. In fact, to meet the "routine expenses" of his ashrams, he has been forced to sell a couple of his large circle of cars. Predictably, his SOS calls to his erstwhile minister friends and proteges are being studiously ignored. The Congress(I) functionary explains why: "His equation with the new leadership is not clear, and all of us are waiting for clear signals."

But Brahmachari, if bloody, is still unbowed. His back-up strategy should see him comfortably off, government patronage or not. His assets are considerable: three aircraft, two private airstrips, three ashrams, one Mercedes, two bungalows and around 775 km of land in Jammu under his direct or indirect control. Ever since the first disturbing signals, the swami has worked at reinforcing his position: since 1982, he has bought over 50 acres of land in Haryana for his Aparna Studios Pvt Ltd along with former MP Yashpal Kapoor, who happens to be one of the directors. Within six months, a huge studio complete with the best facilities and most sophisticated equipment in north India came up there. Officials of the Information & Broadcasting Ministry acknowledge this, and over a hundred episodes of Doordarshan's Hum Log have already been filmed there. The charges are right royal too: Rs 20,000 per day.

Buoyed by its success, Brahmachari has launched into film-making himself. He is producing a small budget film on the science of yoga, for which he has signed on a Bombay actor and playback singer Asha Bhosle. The star of course, is the swami himself who sings three songs in the film. Over 40,000 ft of the two-hour film have already been shot at the studios, at the Bharatpur bird sanctuary and other hill stations of north India. The film is expected to be released this June.

Nothing seems to have fazed the swami. "I will continue my yoga teaching and establish the nation's only university devoted to yoga," he vows. "Even if the funds don't come," he says bravely, "I will confine my activities to a very small scale. But the truth will always prevail. I am sure I will receive the financial and moral support from all for the cause which was so dear to prime minister Indira Gandhi," he adds typically. Nevertheless the grounded swami has never faced such rough weather since he first landed in New Delhi in the early '50s.

ANTI-DEFECTION BILL

Taming the Turncoats

THE MOTHER had a predilection for sweeping issues under the carpet, and to let them rest there. The son is visibly in a hurry. Mrs Gandhi introduced a constitution amendment bill against defection in May 1973 which hung fire for two years, finally to be overtaken by the Emergency and given a decent burial. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, on the other hand, promised an anti-defection law in his poll campaign last year-end, and, presto, there was such a law within eight weeks.

The 52nd amendment to the Constitution, carried out last fortnight by the two Houses of the Parliament where the ruling Congress(I) enjoys a steamroller majority, is purported to end the era of fickle-mindedness in politics. Personally for Rajiv, nothing could have boosted his clean image more a month before the assembly elections in 11 states of the Union, more so because it is the Congress(I) rather than the Opposition which has unquestionably been the traditional beneficiary of defection. Of the 2,700-odd recorded cases of defection between 1967 and 1983, as many as 1,900 defected into the Congress or the Congress(I); and, of the 15 chief ministers who defected during this period to usurp the lofty chair, at least 10 were Congressmen.

The amendment bill, which was enacted in Parliament despite an opposition walk-out, puts a summary end to 35 years of "legislative anarchism" in Indian politics by making floor-crossing almost impossible. It provides that a member of either Houses of Parliament or state legislature will cease to be a member:

- if he resigns from the party which selected him;
- if he votes, or abstains from voting, in the House "contrary to any direction" issued by the political party to which he belongs; or
- if he has been expelled from such political party "in accordance with the procedure established by the Constitution, rules or regulations" of such party.

"I don't understand why the Opposition is expressing its unhappiness over the bill, because its basic purpose is to cleanse the political life of this country of the dirt accumulated over the years," said Asoke Sen, the 71-year-old law minister who piloted the bill. But the Opposition was quite willing to look the gift horse in the mouth because, according to its leaders, the "expulsion clause" by which a member expelled by his party is simultaneously disqualified from the House, automatically "confers legitimacy on party despotism".

It is not certain why Rajiv insisted on adding this clause even though in his two meetings with the opposition leaders on January 18 and 21 he had agreed to remove this provision from the bill. Sen surmised: "Perhaps the prime minister's opinion was shaped by recent instances of dissidence within the Congress(I) in which partymen having openly revolted against the leadership continued as members of Parliament or state legislatures."

There were of course other such nettling instances of Shyam Sunder Mohapatra and F.M. Khan in the Rajya Sabha, both expelled from the Congress(I) yet continuing as members; and A.R. Antulay and Akbar Ahmed in the state assemblies of Maharashtra and Uttar Pradesh respectively who had won the elections on Congress(I) tickets to drift away later. Rajiv pointedly referred to Mohapatra in a meeting on the amendment bill at the Cabinet Committee on Political Affairs (CCPA) to which Sen was invited.

Till his expulsion from the party last year, Mohapatra, a former general secretary of the All India Congress Committee(I) (AICC-I), had carefully avoided voting in the House against the party whip though his role was openly critical of the leadership outside the House. But the new legislation apparently makes no distinction between members' views and conduct within the House and outside. Said L.K. Advani, general secretary of the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) and Rajya Sabha member: "This will muffle dissent forever in a party like the Congress(I) where no internal elections are held and there is no inner-party democracy." The last time that party elections were held in the Congress was at the AICC session in 1972, way before the 1978 split which led to the birth of the Congress(I).

Though the opposition leaders do not admit it, the new amendment eliminates their hope of renewed dissidence in the Congress(I) which is often the signal for building up a general anti-Congress(I) movement in the country. At one stroke, therefore, Rajiv had nipped in the bud the possibility of an opposition consolidation in the near future and the danger of dissidence within his party—probably over distribution of tickets for the impending assembly elections. "This is the new government's first step towards totalitarianism," Madhu Dandavate, Lok Sabha member of the Janata Party, dramatically put it.

However, the amendment, which

"I don't understand why the Opposition is unhappy because its (the bill's) basic purpose is to cleanse politics of the dirt accumulated over the years."

ASOKE SEN,
law minister who piloted the bill involves Articles 102(2) and 191(2) of the Constitution, involving disqualification of members of Parliament and the state legislatures respectively, also adds an altogether new dimension to the concept of party splits. Earlier, splits had occurred in virtually all parties; even the exit of Mrs Gandhi from the Congress in 1969 and 1978 falls within the purview of splits. Last year, the Congress(I) unabashedly lent its support to three breakaway minority governments in Jammu & Kashmir, Andhra Pradesh and Sikkim. The ploy did not work in Andhra Pradesh and Sikkim, but, in the case of Jammu & Kashmir, the defectors' government led by G.M. Shah is still resting on the prop of the 26 Congress(I) MLA's.

But the new amendment lays down that breakaway members will be disqualified if the split involves less than a third of the strength of the party in the House. This part of the amendment deprived the compulsive party-changers of even the cover of leaving en masse, because, in the context of the Congress (I)'s present strength of 400 in the Lok Sabha, possible defectors can retain their seats only if they can gather a support of around 133.

Unfortunately, the amendment, as Sen readily pointed out, "is prospective and cannot be retrospective". Had it been so, the 11 MLA's of the National Conference in Jammu & Kashmir who had deserted the 46-member ruling party last year to form the ruling and breakaway National Conference (Khaleda) would have lost their seats, subject to the amendment being applicable to the state which has a special status under Article 370 of the Constitution.

Still, so overwhelming was the appeal of the amendment to the general public that the implicit niceties of the bill were generally ignored and it was welcomed by most. N.T. Rama Rao, the Andhra Pradesh chief minister, who had himself been a victim of Centrally-engineered defection in August last year, was so impressed by the legislation that he ordered his party MP's to vote for the "entire amendment" unreservedly. "Let us hope," he said in a statement, "that this legislation will mark the beginning of a new political culture."

Significantly, the anti-defection law takes immediate effect because the sections of the Constitution it seeks to amend are not on the entrenched list and, therefore, it is not necessary for the bill to be ratified by a two-thirds majority in half the state assemblies. Thus the present composition of Parliament virtually gets frozen in its present state as a result of the amendment. Nor is future regrouping possible in the state assemblies. However, the amendment does not ban mergers of parties and groups.

Before the elections, Rajiv had promised to carry out a total package of electoral reforms which included not only bringing about a law against defection but also delinking elections from money power and patronage. By legislating the bill against defection, Rajiv has shown his preference for redeeming the electoral pledge piecemeal, maybe leaving the task of enforcing a ceiling on election expenses of his own party candidates as well as others for a date later than the assembly elections in March.

The speed with which the anti-defection law has been enforced has brightened his government's image to its admirers and even many of its critics. If only the total package of electoral reforms were carried out, the Government's intention would have appeared to be entirely untainted by motives.

RAIDS

Spring Cleaning

FEW GOVERNMENTS that decide on a crackdown against suspected corruption choose to avoid the glare of favourable publicity. Yet that was precisely what the Government did last fortnight as it began a wide-ranging investigation into a host of bank and business transactions, while simultaneously ordering raids on suspected smugglers and other economic criminals. And it seemed certain that heads would roll very soon, especially in the Government-owned banks.

More than 200 investigators drawn from the Cabinet Secretariat and the Union Ministries of Home and Finance launched a massive but strangely silent campaign to track down both the domestic and overseas links involved in smuggling, espionage, bank frauds and doubtful commercial deals signed by Government agencies since 1980. Finance Minister Vishwanath Pratap Singh explained that "sometimes you can't publicise the actions you have already taken because of administrative compulsions," but the real reason was that the Government did not want enquiries into banks to get publicised in a manner that would cast doubts on the banking system itself. Home Minister S.B.Chavan was equally tight-lipped, explaining blandly that the Government is determined to make it clear that corrupt and dishonest people have no place in the new Government.

The official silence, however, only served to give currency to wild rumours about raids being conducted against one prominent businessman or the other, with newspapers publishing reports that hinted at the possible identity of the alleged culprits but without going to the extent of naming them.

Senior officials from the Finance Ministry's Customs Department and Enforcement Directorate were scouring Europe in search of information about the conduits for laundering black money and about people who may have influenced the decision-making process in Delhi. But their real objective was to get a fix on the reasons for the likely loss of a staggering Rs 200 crore advanced as loans by various Indian banks in London to businessmen of Indian origin settled abroad. In addition, reports reaching the Finance Ministry said that over Rs 100 crore may have changed hands as illegal commissions on large contracts involving the import of foodgrain, fertiliser, sugar, petroleum products and defence equipment. The contracts themselves are valued at over Rs 5,000 crore.

With regard to controversial banking transactions, the investigations centred on the loans given by the Punjab National Bank and the Central Bank of India, especially to the Esal group in London, which was declared insolvent by a London court last month.

Finance Ministry officials seized the opportunity to run a new broom through the more than two dozen public sector banks. Finance Minister Singh not only refused to extend the three-year terms of the directors of 12 banks but also issued instructions to his ministry's banking division to refer to him the dossiers on the controversial chairmen of various banks.

Towards the end of last fortnight, a decision was taken to change at least four bank chairmen, with the crucial meeting on the subject being chaired by Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi himself. It was also decided to amend the criminal procedures so that action against recalcitrant officials would be easier. In yet another move to limit the number of people who could influence banking decisions, it was decided to reduce the membership of bank boards from the present 14 to nine.

Meanwhile, R.C.Misra, the tubby chairman of the Central Board of Excise and Customs, unleashed his men on smugglers and organised raids on shops selling smuggled goods. The raids were conducted simultaneously at Delhi's Lajpat Rai market (a free-wheeling wholesale centre for electronics goods of every description) and Calcutta's appropriately named Fancy Bazar. Goods worth more than Rs 1 crore were seized. More than 20 middle-level smugglers were detained across the country.

The commercial world, meanwhile, was agog with excitement and tension as rumours spread that action was being initiated against key businessmen who had been involved in controversial deals. While there was no confirmation possible on who exactly was being investigated, the names that figured on the grapevine invariably mentioned people who were close to the former finance minister, Pranab Mukherjee. The odd man out in this pack was former principal secretary to the prime minister P.C. Alexander's younger brother C. Cherian, who is a prominent Cochin-based shrimp exporter.

Cherian, however, issued a hot denial of any raid having been conducted at his office, and threatened to sue the papers that had reported the 'raid'. Another person to issue a heated denial was the London-based Swraj Paul, who was hinted at in a newspaper report. Said Paul: "This talk of raids on me is a load of rubbish. And there have been no raids that I know of on the offices of my brothers in Calcutta. The Government must investigate the journalists who plant stories like this." That discounted hints by police sources in Calcutta that some action was afoot.

Sources within the Finance Ministry said that over 500 files were being scrutinised for possible leads. These related to permission granted on a host of deals involving technical and financial tie-ups, company take-overs, the use of foreign brand names, suspected tax evasion, and much else. Over a dozen leading industrialists camped in New Delhi for over a week, but none of them got an audience with the new leadership.

What exactly would materialise at the end of the whole exercise remained unclear. But the Government's multi-pronged attack made one thing clear: at least a couple of the new ministers were making a determined bid to try and provide a clean government.

MAHARASHTRA

Farmers' Force

THE FARMERS' leader, Sharad Joshi of the Shetkari Sanghatana is back in action. The farmers' convention held last fortnight in Dhule clearly demonstrated his clout, with leaders of all major opposition parties in the state vying with each other to express their support for his cause. They had reason to woo Joshi and his farmers, particularly with the Assembly elections looming close. In the recent parliamentary polls, the Sanghatana had demonstrated its effectiveness in channelising discontent over procurement prices into an anti-Congress(I) campaign. This may not have helped the Opposition win any seats, but even in some Congress(I) strongholds, the fight was so tough that the ruling party could scrape through with narrow margins.

Union Minister Vasant Sathe experienced the Sanghatana effect first hand in his constituency of Wardha central where, after a nervous campaign, he managed to win by 24,000 votes—a steep fall from his 1980 margin of nearly 2 lakh votes. In Washim, Amravati and Nasik, the Opposition actually came close to winning. Congress(I) politicians all over Maharashtra were greeted by Sanghatana boards banning their entry into the villages. The farmers' most effective weapon was the gaa bandhi, which stopped Congressmen and debt collectors from visiting the villages without prior permission.

Congress(I) candidate from Amravati, Usha Chaudhary was treated to another Sanghatana tactic: heckling. The farmers raised embarrassing questions about what the candidate's stand had been on farmers' issues during parliamentary debates. Chaudhary snapped: "Am I supposed to carry my parliamentary papers with me to recall what happened during long-ago debates?"

That is why the Dhule convention was of such crucial political importance, and the opposition parties so keen to woo the farmers. Joshi ultimately announced that the Sanghatana would support the Opposition, but only on the condition that they unite under a common manifesto, leader, programme and symbol. In a considerably chastened mood, the opposition parties in the state seem prepared for the first three pre-conditions, even accepting Sharad Pawar of the Congress(S) as their leader. It is only the last one that might prove difficult. "The sharing of a common symbol may present technical difficulties but this time we are very hopeful of complete accord in other matters," says Prakash Javadekar, general secretary of the BJP's youth wing.

PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

Sharad Joshi (centre): show of strength

An important issue at the convention—the third since the Sanghatana was founded in 1978—was the question of the involvement of its members, many of whom belong to the Congress(I), in the assembly elections. Joshi had in fact invited representatives of all political parties to the convention, to state their attitude towards farmers. But many of the farmers themselves were keen to keep to the path of struggle and not get involved in the elections. As a farmer from Parbhani noted, "the choice is between the farmers' struggle and supporting the capitalistic parties. Let the farmers go their own way." Joshi, who gave up a UN job with the International Telecommunications Union in Geneva to become a farmer admitted: "If you leave the path of struggle and go for electioneering, you can get caught in manoeuvring and deviate from the main purpose." Nevertheless, the Sanghatana ultimately decided to get involved, although as Joshi remarked, the Congress(I) was "enemy number one", and the Opposition "enemy number two".

Significantly, the Sanghatana, which has been branded as an organisation of big farmers, had included representatives from the radical left and champions of landless labourers at the Dhule rally. Kumar Shiralkar, leader of the Dhule landless tribals, Sharad Patil, leader of the Dhule breakaway CPI(M) and Swami Agnivesh of Haryana, who has been the champion of bonded labourers were present at the convention. In fact in March a workshop of leaders of mass movements is being held by the Sanghatana near Pune.

Joshi was much in the news in 1979, 1980 and 1981 when the farmers agitated for higher prices for onions, sugarcane and milk. Since then, however, the Sanghatana has kept a low profile but Joshi refutes the theory that nothing substantial has been achieved. He points out that there is a new awakening amongst farmers, and farmers' representatives from 11 states were present at the convention. Calling for an hour-long road-blocking agitation all over the state in early February, Joshi said: "You can't say we have achieved nothing. There is a time and place to fight." Last week the Sanghatana challenged the Maharashtra Government's removal of thousands of its gaa bandhi boards in the Bombay High Court.

Calling for the replacement of the Agricultural Prices Commission by an agricultural costs commission, Joshi said that while the new prime minister should be given a chance, the stepmotherly attitude to the farmers would have to end.

The only party which failed to turn up at the convention was the Congress(I). On the other hand, not only did Chief Minister Patil rebuff the Sanghatana, the police actually prevented some 4,000 farmers from attending the convention. As many as 250 tractors and trucks were halted under the pretext that the vehicles shouldn't carry people without a proper licence. The indignant delegates retorted that the next time the Congress(I) held a meeting for the prime minister, they would help the police enforce the same rules. "Despite the Government's harassment, they can't stop the awakening of the farmers," says Ram Chandra Babu Patil, president of the Dhule convention. He may be right. The parliamentary elections certainly proved that the farmers' vote was a force to be reckoned with.

MEGHALAYA

The Jowai Jumble

THE CONGRESS(I) Government of Meghalaya is currently busy covering up the last traces of its culpability in the state Public Health Engineering (PHE) Department's multi-crore rupee scandal that had set the North-east buzzing with shock and incredulity last June. Although the state Government is yet to make all the details public, this scandal is reported to have involved over Rs 13 crore and the two ministers who had been looking after the PHE department. The inquiry committee set up by the Government amidst much publicity last year to identify the culprits, finally submitted its report to the state Cabinet last fortnight but significantly gave a clean chit to the two ministers. On the other hand, the report predictably nailed several PHE officials, some of whom are expected to be eventually convicted.

Opposition leader Kyndiah

Opposition leaders point out that the committee has chosen not to probe beneath the superficial facts of the case or the specific role of the two ministers.

The report only confirms the worst suspicions of the state's opposition leaders, who point out that the committee has obviously chosen not to probe beneath the superficial facts of the case or the specific role of the two ministers. "The ruling party refused to allow a high-powered independent commission to probe the case and instead chose a serving bureaucrat to prepare an official report," says B.B. Lyngdoh, a leader of the Opposition and former chief minister. Indeed, the terms of reference of the inquiry committee, headed by the Managing Director of the Meghalaya Government Construction Corporation, N. Rymjah, did not specifically require a probe into the role of the two ministers, despite Chief Minister Captain William Sangma's assurance that he would not shield anybody found guilty in the affair, even if they were ministers.

In fact, so devilishly simple was the case that it hardly required a special enquiry to pin down the principal culprit, R.B. Giri, a lowly executive engineer in the PHE department's Jowai division. Against a total allocation of Rs 40 lakh for the purchase of materials during the financial year 1983-84, Giri had placed orders for materials worth Rs 13.27 crore and had managed to pay the contractors Rs 4.63 crore before he was restrained. The executive engineer had clearly overstepped his bounds, because normally, an executive engineer cannot make payments beyond Rs 20,000 per month without prior sanction from the department.

What is mind-boggling is the absence of any checks and the fact that the amount paid out is not insignificant considering that the department's entire capital budget for the year was a little less than Rs 10 crore, while the state's annual plan size was about Rs 64 crore. The Chief Public Health Engineer, P. Arunachalam must have known what was happening from the monthly accounts reaching him, but strangely he took no action.

"I was kept in the dark about what was happening," claims Salseng Marak, the former PHE minister, "and when I came to know, I ordered stoppage of payment and further purchase of materials immediately." But there is irrefutable evidence to prove that Marak had come to know of what was happening at Jowai by mid-December. While preparing a reply to an innocuous assembly question on the expenditure incurred for the purchase of material by each of the PHE department's divisions since the beginning of the financial year, the department's new Secretary, D. Das, had been alarmed to discover that the executive engineer had already placed orders worth Rs 2.64 crore.

This had been brought to Marak's notice on December 14 whereas his order to restrain the executive engineer at Jowai was passed only on January 10 1984 (No.M/PHE/6/83/130). In the meantime, state funds had been continuously flowing out of Jowai. The secretary's desperate wireless message (No. PHE 177/83/PT/24) to the manager of the United Bank of India, Jowai, urging the immediate suspension of "further payments of all bills sent by the PHE officers at Jowai except bills meant for pay and allowances," was mysteriously ignored. The secretary subsequently dashed to Jowai but could neither find the offending engineer nor any details of how much money had already been paid.

Finally, Secretary Das wrote to the minister suggesting it would "be befitting to institute an inquiry commission headed by an eminent retired engineer not below the rank of chief engineer and an efficient retired financial advisor and also a member of the Finance Department or a senior officer from the office of the accountant-general, Meghalaya". Marak acquiesced to this suggestion on February 6 and forwarded the file to the minister of state, Nihon Ksih, for his "views". Ksih ignored the file and did not give his approval for an inquiry until he was called by Marak and forced to comply on March 30, 1984.

Investigations later revealed that in mid-December and January'84, Giri had placed an additional Rs 10.6 crore worth of supply orders. Similarly the bulk of the money was actually paid out during the period between November 9, 1983 to January 2, 1984. The total payment made by the executive engineer was Rs 2.94 crore. Ultimately at least Rs 4.63 crore was paid, but the state Government has not divulged its loss yet.

Marak not only blames Ksih for the undue delay in approving the inquiry but also feels that the minister for state "should have taken steps at the earliest opportunity in this matter since he was in charge of the Jowai division". Marak also does not deny that Ksih was well acquainted with Executive Engineer Giri.

Nihon Ksih was elected from the Rymbai assembly constituency, the headquarters of which is Jowai, on an independent ticket and was inducted into the Congress(I) ministry reportedly because of his "influence". "Ksih was responsible for all administrative matters and Giri's appointment as the officiating executive engineer," says Marak. Having started his career as a member of road maintenance gangs, Giri, an under-matriculate, was promoted to the rank of an overseer. Subsequently, he was promoted in quick succession and made executive engineer in August 1983. Giri held three BDO posts while he was executive engineer, Jowai.

It was common knowledge in official circles that engineers could take advantage of the prevailing administrative system to spend far beyond their authority, but despite this, policy makers in the PHE department did nothing to plug the loopholes by introducing a letter of credit system as adopted by the Assam administration. "There was something wrong with the system," says Marak in retrospect, while opposition legislator P.R. Kyndiah feels "the system was deliberately kept open for misuse".

It was only after the scandal leaked out, with the Gauhati-based daily, The Sentinel, publishing exposes and the Opposition creating a furore in the Assembly last year, that the Government introduced the letter of credit system which allows the drawal of monies up to the sanctioned limit. In the absence of this system all that Giri had to do was issue supply orders to "friendly contractors", get the store-in-charge to certify the delivery of supplies and then write out a cheque. "Under this system, it was not even necessary for the supplier to actually supply the material," adds a bureaucrat.

The involvement of the PHE department's minister for state is suggested by a number of informal slips he had written to Giri. One of the slips seized shows that Ksih instructed Giri to issue supply orders to two particular contractors, with a footnote stating that all the bills should be "kept pending as discussed". In another slip, Ksih writes: "Please release this bill in favour of... as discussed." Curiously, Ksih has not denied writing these slips, nor has the inquiry committee read anything particularly unusual in them.

The controversial memos from Ksih to Giri: incriminating evidence

WHAT the inquiry committee has established is the worthlessness of much of the material supplies. "Most of the stuff can't even be sold as scrap," comments a bureaucrat. On the other hand, the contractors can compel the state Government to pay up the money still owed to them, which is over Rs 8 crore, since they have legal proof of actually having delivered the goods. But a majority of the contractors have shown no inclination to go to court. "They have made enough money and courts will mean only further complications and investigations," explains a senior police official. The lucky contractors went on a spending spree last year and one of them even bought a Mercedes Benz that the police unfortunately seized.

The tragic part is that Jowai town still does not have the drinking water facilities supposed to have been provided by the PHE department. And the Jowai affair is hardly an isolated occurrence. Currently, another inquiry committee is investigating an identical case in the department's Tura division involving Rs 3 crore. In Williamnagar division too, the PHE department executive engineer has been alleged to be guilty of gross overspending. To top it all, the department actually had an identified surplus stock of materials worth about Rs 2 crore at the beginning of the 1983-84 financial year.

Ever since the formation of the state in 1972, the Centre has been pumping in ever higher doses of financial assistance for development programmes. The state survives on Central assistance, which has been more than doubling every five years. In the Fifth Plan the state's plan size was Rs 135 crore and in the Sixth Plan it was allocated Rs 265 crore, while its next plan is expected to be around Rs 570 crore. Meghalaya desperately needs development and in this context, says Kyndiah, condoning ministers responsible for shocking wastage of funds "is not becoming of a government committed to a clean and efficient administration" He adds: "The amount involved in the Jowai scandal is frightening, considering that Meghalaya, with a population of just about 14 lakh has an annual revenue of just Rs 16 crore".

Though the chief minister did appoint a commission of inquiry and ordered the arrest of Giri and two of his colleagues—who were subsequently released on bail—he steadfastly refused to drop the two ministers on the grounds that he would not "succumb to political pressure". Neither did he agree to an inquiry by the CBI. Instead, Marak was taken out of the PHE department and placed in charge of food and civil supplies while Nihon Ksih was given subordinate charge of forests and independent charge of stamps and registration. The PHE portfolio is currently being looked after by the chief minister himself. From the Government's point of view, the submission of the Rymjah Committee Report is the final denouement in the Jowai affair.

If your competitors make your meter the ultimate measure of their own accuracy, what does that make you?

Good question. And, in our case, far from hypothetical.

Because we do make the positive displacement meter which is already used widely by weights and measures authorities, and bulkmeter users and manufacturers as a Master Meter.

The TL Bulkmeter, the "Rolls Royce" among PDMs (positive displacement meters).

With accuracy of measurement better than ±0.1% between 100% and 10% of the rated capacity.

And, a host of features that mean accuracy of measurement for a long, long time, apart from trouble-free performance.

Besides the TL Bulkmeter, there's also our wide range of bulkmeter accessories, quick-release self-sealing TL Couplings and, our latest microprocessor based, time sharing electronic control and data acquisition system for modern-day industrial and process control, the PDM Controller.

And, our associate company (Crown Measurement) has just launched a compact and lightweight PDM specially suited to industrial flow measurement.

All these useful products are the outcome of totally indigenous expertise and R&D, incidentally.

Going back to the original question, now that you know a bit about us, maybe you should draw your own conclusions.

MANIPUR

Peace Factor

SITTING in a room jammed with people, a cream shawl draped around him, intelligent eyes flashing as he talks softly, Nameirakpam Bisheswar Singh looks more like a Gandhian student leader than a one-time chief of the revolutionary People's Liberation Army (PLA), the terror and legend of the north-eastern valley of Manipur. Three-and-a-half years of imprisonment have left Bisheswar a sick man: his hands tremble continuously and his jaw twists tortuously as he speaks. "For the last few years the shackles prevented me from sitting or lying down properly," he says quietly. His kidneys are damaged and asthma attacks convulse him daily. Yet this sick man elected to the Manipur Assembly while still in jail and subsequently released on bail on January 11, promises to become a major factor in the state's politics in the near future.

Flushed with new-found freedom, the former revolutionary is yet to fix his political bearings. "Right now I am not in a position to make any political statement," Bisheswar told INDIA TODAY five days after his release. There are a number of thorny questions about his recent decisions that Bisheswar will have to clarify to supporters now that he has turned from armed struggle to parliamentary politics.

Popular support for Bisheswar is undeniably overwhelming. The day he was declared elected from the Thongju constituency, thousands took to the streets and went in procession to Imphal jail demanding his release. All the same, Bisheswar, a believer in Marxism, wonders whether this support is "individual or ideological". If popular support for him stems from his legendary past, Bisheswar is going to find his politics an uphill task.

On the other hand, the question uppermost in the minds of Congress(I) leaders, army and intelligence officials, is whether Bisheswar's apostasy will succeed in bringing an end to insurgency in Meitei. Admitting that Bisheswar "should become an important person in state politics" Chief Minister Rishang Keishing emphasises that this will only be possible if the former PLA chief "utilises his present position properly".

The security forces do not, however, presume that peace depends solely on Bisheswar. The unknown factor in the current equation is the present chief of the PLA, Temba Singh, and his followers camping in the jungles of northern Burma, ostensibly still undergoing training. Army intelligence believes that Bisheswar and Temba are not exactly the best of friends. The former is reported to have opposed Temba's marriage with a non-Meitei tribal girl called Mary in 1981 and subsequently banished him from their group. Nothing was heard of Temba till April 1982 when he took over the leadership of the PLA from Mani Kanta Singh. By this time, Bisheswar had been captured by the army in an encounter at Tekcham in July 1981 and his successor, Kunja Behari, had been subsequently killed. Temba secured control of the PLA since he was the only remaining Ogha or Guru as the Lhasha trained PLA members are called. The other Oghas had either been killed or captured.

As it is, Meitei insurgency has been at a low ebb for the past one year, the last incident being a shoot-out between the Central Reserve Police Force (CRPF) and the PLA in April 1983. The army's success in containing insurgency in the state's valley area has lent credibility to the Keishing Government. And now the latest feather in Keishing's hat is Bisheswar joining the mainstream. Asked whether Bisheswar had ever expressed a desire to join the Congress(I), Keishing told INDIA TODAY: "About a year ago he wrote to me that he would first contest as an independent and then join the Congress(I) Party when elected." Bisheswar, however, disclaims knowledge of any such letter.

Keishing's rivals in his ministry, especially those who had aspired for chief ministership, have begun making friendly overtures to Bisheswar in a bid to rope him in with their plans of destabilising Keishing. The five former Congress(I) MLA's (out of the 13 expelled from the party on the eve of the elections), who have been elected as independents this time are another factor the dissidents are hoping to use against Keishing. Irengbam Tompok Singh, the former deputy chief minister given the education portfolio in the latest ministry, met the former PLA chief and is reported to have suggested they work together to eradicate corruption.

But Keishing remains unperturbed: "The Congress organisation as a whole today is determined to enforce discipline within the party, and the prevailing conditions do not warrant any such adventure from party members." Knowing this Tompok Singh and a couple of other contenders for chief ministership have not expressed dissension publicly.

Keishing's next major task is to further the isolation of the insurgent National Socialist Council of Nagaland (NSCN) that operates in the northern hills of Manipur. By launching a programme to enrol several thousand Naga tribals in the Congress(I) and forming Congress(I) units in scores of villages, Keishing is in the process of creating a "nationalist force to counter the anti-national activities of the NSCN extremists".

Bisheswar is thus a pivotal factor in the attempts to bring about permanent peace in Manipur. Although he contested the elections with the objective of bringing peace and removing corruption from the state, the successes of his aims are fraught with many uncertainties, not the least of which are the three court cases pending against him.

Moreover, Bisheswar still has enemies, especially the former members of the Revolutionary Government of Manipur (RGM). O. Sudhir, RGM leader, had relinquished arms and had been rehabilitated by the state Government in 1978 only to be killed by his former disciple Bisheswar Singh's gang. This is perhaps why the former PLA chief continues to be surrounded by armed guards who frisk every visitor. The Government also cannot afford to lose Bisheswar at this juncture, for without him the end of insurgency in Manipur will once again become a distant hope.

ANDHRA PRADESH

Critical Clash

WHEN the 67-year-old Dr Shankar Dayal Sharma replaced the controversial Ram Lal as the governor of Andhra Pradesh, on August 28 last year, he was described as a cool man on a hot seat. However, it didn't take long for him to change. Last fortnight, when Sharma declined to give a fresh lease of life to three ordinances, it not only soured relations between him and Chief Minister N.T. Rama Rao but is beginning to precipitate a constitutional crisis over the role of a governor.

Exactly a month after Rama Rao wrote to Sharma urging that the three ordinances be re issued, the governor sent in a terse 21-sentence reply stating that the Constitution permits only limited legislative powers to the governor and that an ordinance has to be ratified by the legislature within a specified period; political parties, high courts and the Supreme Court had criticised the repromulgation of ordinances as a violation of the Constitution and reissue of ordinances would be a gross constitutional impropriety as these were earlier repromulgated a number of times.

The three ordinances which have lapsed relate to the abolition of the posts of part-time village officers, district formations, and the payment of salaries and removal of disqualifications. Significantly, a fourth ordinance promulgated during the Bhaskara Rao regime raising the age of retirement from 55 to 58 was repromulgated by Sharma on the specious plea that it came up for reissue for the first time. The other three have been reissued four times each.

The ordinance on the abolition of posts of village officers is most important for Rama Rao as it was first issued to sack the 37,597 village officers like munsiffs, patels and patwaris whom he described as "hereditary vestiges of feudal rule and source of tyranny of simple villagers". But the planned change in village administration could not be made as the bill to replace the ordinance was referred to a joint select committee of the legislature and its report was not ready when the Assembly was dissolved on November 22 last year. The plan to recruit a regular cadre of village assistants in their place had also begun. But the stalemate is leading to administrative problems and litigation with some of the former part-time village officers taking the issue to the high court.

A. PRABHAKAR RAO

Rama Rao with Governor Sharma: conflicting positions

In his latest letter to Sharma, Rama Rao pointed out that there are no fetters on the legislative power of the governor under Article 213 of the Constitution. He sent notes drafted by the Law Secretary D.J. Jagannatha Raju and Advocate General K.C. Reddy as replies to the points raised by Sharma. In their explanation the legal experts contended:

- the powers of the governor to legislate under Article 213 are coextensive with legislative powers (R.K. Garg vs Union of India, Supreme Court, 1981);
- the Constitution only stipulates that an ordinance is to be replaced by an act of legislature;
- the courts cannot go into the question of reasons for repromulgation of an ordinance (Mathura Prasad vs State of Bihar, Patna High Court, 1975. That verdict stated it is not for the court to declare an ordinance as ultra vires on the score of rule of successive ordinances. It is for the legislature to disapprove on the rule by successive ordinances or for the electorate at the next poll); and
- none of the ordinances has been finally rejected by the state legislature so there is no bar or impropriety in repromulgating them. The governor did not consult the law officers on this issue.

Sharma who has impressive educational credentials including a doctoral degree in constitutional law from the Cambridge University, a stint at Harvard School of Law, and Lincoln's Inn, however, remained unconvinced. Said a peeved Rama Rao: "I am not for confrontation but I want to work for the service of my people." Meanwhile, the chief minister described the governor as the "puppet of the Centre" while talking to journalists on the ordinance controversy.

The governor, however, told INDIA TODAY: "As the constitutional head of the state and as one who has sworn allegiance to the Constitution I will be guided by it in making my decisions." Yet, the delay in replying to Rama Rao without categorically stating that he refused to repromulgate the ordinances and not calling the state's legal experts raised doubts about Sharma's role. Legal opinion has been overwhelmingly in favour of the reissue of the ordinances as it did not involve new policies of a caretaker ministry and legislation had already been brought forward by the Telugu Desam Ministry. Said one leading lawyer: "Even the caretaker Charan Singh ministry could issue seven ordinances including a new penal law against blackmarketeers. It is the Congress(I) that has perpetuated ordinance raj and is indulging in filibuster tactics in the Andhra Pradesh Legislative Council."

By the end of the fortnight, the caretaker cabinet had more surprises in store. The governor as chancellor was dealing with universities directly without consulting the Education Ministry. With the ordinance factor also destined to become a major issue in the coming assembly elections the conflict between the chief minister and the governor is rapidly coming to a head.

PUNJAB

Hesitant Steps

PRIORITIES by themselves do not solve problems. This became increasingly clear last fortnight when the Punjab problem, accorded the highest priority by the new Government, became entangled in a web of confusing attitudes and political rhetoric. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi declared himself against a step-by-step treatment of the outstanding issues and wanted an all-or-nothing package. If that seemed to indicate that he would take a tough line on the issue, Haryana Chief Minister Bhajan Lal dragged a large red herring across the north-western sector of the country by talking of a reunification of Punjab, Haryana and Himachal Pradesh—an impractical proposition that nevertheless drew a surprising degree of support from Congressmen.

The Congress(I) also kept up its verbal barrage on what had once been a side issue, the Anandpur Sahib Resolution. And the Akalis themselves talked in a confusing babble of voices. Meanwhile, the three members of the ministerial committee on Punjab had their attention diverted by the parliamentary session. Finally, the elections to state assemblies were announced, and this would almost certainly keep the Government busy for the next few weeks. Unless a dramatic breakthrough suddenly materialised, it seemed likely that Punjab would stay on the back-burner till the middle of March.

Nevertheless, some initial forays were being made discreetly. Home Minister S.B.Chavan, who is a member of the three-man committee, disclosed that "Some mediators from both sides have established contact with each other and have been meeting me and other government leaders. The modalities are being worked out to initiate official moves." The mediators mentioned by Chavan are believed to be some non-political Sikhs trusted by both the Government and the Akalis. INDIA TODAY learnt that one such mediator had met two of the detained Akali leaders: Atma Singh, senior vice-president of the Shiromani Gurudwara Prabandhak Committee (SGPC), and Jagdev Singh Talwandi, leader of the Akali Dal's hardline faction named after him. Atma Singh is recuperating under police guard in Amritsar after a double cornea transplant, and Talwandi is in Ambala jail.

The mediators also spoke to the second-string Akali leaders officiating for the party's jailed supremos, including the Dal ad hoc committee's convenor, Surjan Singh Thekedar, the acting SGPC chief Prem Singh Lalpura, the five head priests and former Punjab finance minister Balwant Singh. The mediators are believed to have handed in written reports to the cabinet committee on their discussions with the Akali leaders.

Rao

Chavan

Pant

The three members of the ministerial committee on Punjab had their attention diverted by the parliamentary session, and it seemed likely that Punjab would stay on the back-burner till after the assembly elections.

On his part, the head priest of the Akal Takht, Jathedar Kirpal Singh, told the mediators that the Khalistan demand was not an Akali creation but that this was being forced on them by the "intransigence of the Government in reaching a settlement". Atma Singh echoed this when he said, "The longer an overall political settlement is delayed, the greater will be the danger of hard core elements assuming pre-eminence in the voice of the Sikh community."

If any evidence of this were needed, it was provided last fortnight by the attack on Kirpal Singh a few days after he talked to the mediators. The Government itself was alive to the dangers involved. R.V.Subramaniam, senior adviser to the Punjab governor, said that such attacks, even if infrequent and far apart, could shatter the peace of the Punjab countryside. And with Subramaniam estimating that between 500 and 600 terrorists are still "unaccounted for" after Operation Bluestar, such attacks can be expected as long as Punjab remains in a twilight zone of army-imposed peace.

One way of defusing the tension suggested by the mediators is to release Akali leaders against whom there are no serious charges. This would include Akali Dal supremo Harchand Singh Longowal, leading politicians like Prakash Singh Badal and Surjit Singh Barnala, and Atma Singh and Talwandi as well.

Apart from this, a number of other points were suggested by Akali leaders whose views were obtained, either directly or through the intermediaries. These included:

- ▶ punishing those guilty for the violence in November 1984;
- ▶ delinking Chandigarh from Fazilka and granting it to Punjab;
- ▶ releasing the thousands of youngsters detained in Punjab if there are no specific charges against them;
- ▶ granting amnesty to those youngsters who have gone across to Pakistan in fear of arrest, if there are no criminal charges against them;
- ▶ referring the Anandpur Sahib Resolution to the Sarkaria Commission, or a tribunal.

Subramaniam agreed indirectly with the need to release some of the Akali leaders, for he said, "they are the only ones who can talk on behalf of the party. Those outside are not in a position to take any definite stance." But on several other issues, it was not clear whether the gulf between the Akalis and the Government was wide or narrow. For instance, the Government has clearly stated that it would like the Akali leaders to speak up against violence and extremism. In fact, some of the Akali leaders contacted said that they had never supported the idea of Khalistan and that they were prepared to issue a statement to this effect and also condemn the role of violence in politics—provided the Government released the Akali leaders and negotiated with them. But on several other issues—like the call for punishing those guilty of the November riots—there seemed little likelihood of the Government obliging.

Among the Akalis, meanwhile, there were signs of impatience. Balwant Singh complained that "the three-man committee has done nothing in three weeks, it has not even written to the convenor of the Akali ad hoc committee." And he felt the Government was not keen on finding a solution to the Punjab problem before the assembly elections.

Meanwhile, there was renewed squabbling within the Punjab Congress(I). The relatively hardline faction led by Darbara Singh reacted quickly to the information that Swaran Singh and Raghunandan Lal Bhatia were trying to mend their fences with the Akalis, convened a meeting of the Pradesh Congress(I) Committee and said the conciliatory moves amounted to offending Mrs Gandhi's policy of keeping the Akalis at a distance. The Swaran Singh move was scuttled. Some of Rajiv Gandhi's own hardened stance on Punjab is believed to originate from the influence of Darbara Singh.

Kripal Singh

There were plenty of differences within the Akali camp too with Rajinder Kaur, daughter of Tara Singh and president of the Istri Akali Dal, being expelled from the party. Rajinder Kaur evidently prefers the soft line vis-a-vis the Government, and had been criticising some of the Akali leaders in her magazine Sant Sipahi. Differences also surfaced over the Anandpur Sahib Resolution. At a press conference in

DELHI RIOTS

Legal Battle

LIFE HAD been going rather well for 37-year-old Shivcharan Singh. Part-owner of a printing press in Bombay, he often travelled to Delhi to be with his wife Harpreet Kaur, daughter Vimi, 7 and son Vikky, 4. When not busy at the press, he helped an amateur theatrical group stage plays. So it was to be just another trip to Delhi when the expectant Shivcharan boarded the Janata Express in Bombay on October 31 with a dozen colleagues from a theatre group.

The theatre group made it to Delhi, but Vimi and Vikky never saw their father again. Shivcharan's journey came to a fiery end beside the track at the Tughlakabad railway station near Delhi where he was dragged out of the sleeper coach by a bloodthirsty mob, beaten senseless and then set on fire while still half-alive. Soon he was just another number on the list of 2,717 Sikhs killed in Delhi and elsewhere following Mrs Gandhi's assassination.

But Harpreet Kaur was not willing to write off her husband as just another statistic. She and her children have started legal proceedings seeking Rs 6 lakh in damages and compensation from the Government for the inability of its employees to protect Shivcharan from the mob at Tughlakabad station. Her lawyers, K.T.S. Tulsi and D.S. Narula, have served notice on the home secretary, the lt-governor of Delhi and the general manager of the Northern Railway to pay the damages or face a suit in the high court. This is the first suit filed on behalf of Sikh victims of the post-assassination violence by lawyers Tulsi and Narula. Several more now are under preparation.

When it comes to court in February, this case could become a trend-setter in torts litigation in India, especially if the court upholds the plea that the Government is liable to pay damages for the misdeeds of its employees. Harpreet's lawyers argue that the Government is liable, and challenge the concept of "sovereign immunity" enjoyed by government servants against being held responsible for the consequences of actions taken by them in the performance of their duty. In the notice, Harpreet has charged that the Delhi police and railway staff "instead of protecting the life and property of the passengers...dragged and handed Shivcharan over to the mob."

HARI OM GULATI

Harpreet was told by non-Sikh colleagues travelling with her husband that upon seeing the mob, Shivcharan had locked himself up in the toilet of the coach. But railway staff travelling in the coach pointed out his hiding place to the mob and even helped them drag him out. Uniformed policemen apparently on duty at the station "deliberately acquiesced in the commission of the crime". It was only ten days later, Harpreet says, that she learned of Shivcharan's death when her brother-in-law identified a photograph of the charred body.

Tulsi and Narula argue that Article 21 of the Constitution, which grants every citizen a fundamental right to life and personal liberty, imposes on government officials like the home secretary and the lt-governor a statutory duty to "effectively look after the life and property and safety" of citizens, especially minorities. "The state must be held liable to repair the damage done by the acts, neglect and defaults of its officers, servants and agents", the notice said.

The lawyers claim that the passivity, connivance and encouragement of the police and railway staff at Tughlakabad station resulted in the infringement of Shivcharan's right to life. "This cannot be corrected by any other method except to award exemplary damages." But assessing the monetary value of a person's life is always a difficult task. In this case the amount was calculated on the basis of Shivcharan's salary and a life expectancy of 75 years. Even assuming that he earned the same amount all his life and spent half of it on himself, his death has deprived his family of Rs 4.56 lakh. "Loss of love and affection," is calculated at Rs 1.44 lakh, making for a total of Rs 6 lakh.

The most significant precedent for Chandigarh last fortnight, Thekedar and Lalpura quoted the 1973 version of the resolution, while Balwant Singh mentioned the watered down version drafted in 1978, and authenticated by Longowal. This only calls for autonomy for the states. But there was little doubt that the resolution would be a major stumbling-block. Rajiv Gandhi said he finds "some parts" of the resolution secessionist. The reference that most Congressmen object to is the description of the Sikhs as a "qaum", which in Urdu and Punjabi means community but which, translated into English, can take on the meaning of a nation. The other is the demand that there should be a dominance of the Khalsa in Punjab. This has been objected to as being against the secular spirit of the Constitution. Minister of State for Law, H.R. Bhardwaj, told INDIA TODAY quite firmly: "The copy of the resolution that I received is secessionist. When a community claims to be a separate nation, it is secessionist." In saying that, he appeared to unfairly lump the whole Sikh community with the resolution and brand it secessionist.

The eminent soldier, Lt-general Jagjit Singh Aurora, said the branding of Sikhs as separatist started when Rajiv Gandhi started "misconstruing and twisting" the Anandpur Sahib Resolution in search of political gain. "If the prime minister talks like this, how can the Akali leaders feel confident that the Government will change its attitude towards them?" Aurora asked.

The soldier also felt that the Government should expect the Akali leaders to let off steam once they were released, but that it should not get unduly perturbed by this. Finally, Aurora argued, the Government should unilaterally concede the Akali demands and ease up on the army clampdown on the state, so that a semblance of normalcy could return. He felt this would take the wind out of the Akali sails. "The people of Punjab will accept this and the leaders will have to lump it," he explained."

But there was no indication last fortnight that the Government was in a mood to accept these suggestions. And Rajiv Gandhi's comments suggested that he was not as yet satisfied with the Akali leaders' stand on the outstanding issues. The simple fact that stood out of the attitudes of the Government and the Akali Dal was that each expected the other to modify its stance before any progress at all could be recorded.

What stood out equally clearly was the fact that the initial hopes of a quick solution to the problem had already faded, that attitudes were getting hardened in some cases, that the numerous knotty issues involved would take a long time to get untangled, and that the Government had so far managed no more than a very hesitant first step: the starting of talks through intermediaries. If a solution is to be found within a reasonable time frame, the pace of activity will have to pick up quickly.

In the meantime, it would be wise to keep in mind Harvard sociologist Karl Deusch's warning—however grim—that the last resort of the frustrated is terrorism.

claiming compensation is the Supreme Court judgement in 1983 in the case of Rudel Sah versus the State of Bihar. Sah, a poor villager, was kept in jail for 14 years even after he was acquitted of charges by a Mirzapur sessions court in 1968. The Supreme Court held that Sah's right to personal liberty guaranteed by Article 21 of the Constitution had been violated. "One of the telling ways in which violation of that right can reasonably be prevented... is to mulct its violators in the payment of monetary compensation. The right of compensation is some palliative for the unlawful acts of instrumentalities act in the name of the public interest and which present for their protection the powers of the state as a shield," the court ruled.

While welcoming the Government declaration that everything possible would be done to compensate the victims of the November violence, lawyer Tulsi has suggested that compensation commissioners, empowered to grant full compensation without having to prove who caused the loss, be appointed in every city effected by the violence. Tulsi warned that the courts may not be able to handle all cases with due despatch "considering the magnitude of the riots and the imperfect law on the point". Recourse to the courts has been encouraged by National Sikh Forum Convenor Lt-general J.S. Aurora (Retd) as, he says, "the Government's record so far does not inspire confidence in the minds of the Sikhs." The guilty had to be punished, he said, and if the Government would not do it, the affected people must move the courts. That is exactly what Harpreet Kaur is doing and the outcome could create judicial history.

TAMIL NADU

Letter Bombs

IT WORE an air of weary inevitability. With Chief Minister M.G. Ramachandran still recuperating in Brooklyn, USA and a shroud of secrecy and confusion cloaking the actual state of his health, his ruling AIADMK back home was heading for a serious split in its ranks. The first overt signs came with the sudden and surprising removal of his confidante, former actress Jayalalitha from her post of deputy leader of the parliamentary party last fortnight. An outraged Jayalalitha immediately hit back at the "gang of four"—Finance Minister V.R. Nedunchezhiyan, party General Secretary, P.U. Shanmugam, R.M. Veerappan, state information minister and V.N. Janaki, MGR's wife whom Jayalalitha calls "the lady in New York who is the de facto chief minister", for having usurped the party in MGR's name and for taking advantage of his medical condition (see interview).

Certainly, the manner of her removal was intriguing enough. It was done supposedly at MGR's behest in a letter sent through a friend (Shanmugam refused to disclose who the 'friend' was) even though latest medical reports indicate that the chief minister is still in no condition to write or dictate letters. Nedunchezhiyan who met the chief minister in the US reported merely that "he is in full possession of his faculties and is also able to utter monosyllables".

Jayalalitha herself was firmly convinced that the letter was a fraud. "I was elected to the post only eight months ago and normally such posts are supposed to be for a full term of six years. Then why have I been suddenly removed? I am convinced that this letter is bogus. They are producing letters and telexes like rabbits from a magician's hat. I wish to meet MGR face to face and ask him what crime I have committed," she stormed.

But Jayalalitha's removal was not the only sign of a party power struggle. Nedunchezhiyan, who had gone to Brooklyn with Chief Secretary K. Chockalingam to discuss the question of formation of the state Government with MGR, returned on January 13 and handed over to Governor S.L. Khurana a mysterious sealed letter. Allegedly signed by the chief minister, the letter cryptically recommended that S. Thirunavukkarasu, a known Jayalalitha supporter, be stripped of the portfolio of excise, handlooms and textiles and be allotted the nutritious noon meals scheme portfolio instead. His earlier functions, the letter supposedly stated, would be handed over to Nedunchezhiyan.

The move smacked of byzantine intrigue. Thirunavukkarasu is the leader of the youth wing of the party and one who has always enjoyed the reputation of being trusted by MGR. In fact, when former commercial taxes minister S.D. Somasundaram was sacked from the party last year, his prestigious portfolio was given over to Thirunavukkarasu. Equally intriguing was the fact that there was hardly any need for a change of portfolios when the new government is to be formed in barely three weeks time. Further, Thirunavukkarasu was not even holding the excise portfolio mentioned in the letter and a puzzled Khurana had to seek clarification from MGR before taking action on the letter. Neither was there any mention of the commercial taxes portfolio. An embarrassed Nedunchezhiyan reportedly told Khurana that the chief minister had forgotten to mention the commercial taxes portfolio. A ruffled Thirunavukkarasu stated: "I doubt if the chief minister applied his mind to the matter. I am questioning whether the chief minister's decision was an independent one or an influenced one. I am going to New York personally to satisfy myself that the decision was his own." Two days before his scheduled departure, a telex message arrived from MGR which stated: "Heard that you plan to visit New York to visit me. You may please wait till my arrival in Madras by the end of the month." Meanwhile, the finance minister produced Xerox copies of the controversial letter to journalists two days later with the angry retort: "This is only to convince you that the letter was from MGR himself. You can ask the chief minister himself when he comes back."

However intriguing the flurry of mail and messages between New York and Madras, it was becoming patently clear that former MGR favourites were falling from grace. Over 100 party workers owing allegiance to the Jayalalitha-Thirunavukkarasu faction were removed

JAYALALITHA

"Let's wait for MGR's return"

Jayalalitha Jayaram, 36, the former AIADMK propaganda secretary and high-profile Rajya Sabha MP, considered to be the political heiress of MGR, was a damsel in distress last fortnight. Insult was added to injury when she was stripped of her post as deputy leader of the AIADMK parliamentary party after having been very unceremoniously turned out of Tamil Nadu House in New Delhi on the midnight of December 31. She was even asked to get out of the party by Agriculture Minister K. Kalimuthu. Putting on a brave and pleasant face in the midst of this political storm, Jayalalitha spoke to INDIA TODAY'S S.H. VENKATRAMANI, sitting in her bungalow in Madras.

On her reactions to the steps taken by the AIADMK against her:

I had made a appeal that I should be allowed to meet MGR. And that has not been allowed. Even a person accused of murder is heard before a judgement is pronounced on him. I should have been given the chance to meet MGR. After all I have not committed a crime, I have only sacrificed a lot and worked very hard for the party.

You will remember that when the party General Secretary P.U. Shanmugam was questioned why I had been stripped of my post as deputy leader of the AIADMK Parliamentary Party, he could not give any reason. He could only say that the party had received instructions from MGR sent through a friend. Who was this friend there was no clue.

I fail to understand where is the sudden need or hurry to change the parliamentary office-bearers of the party. The previous office-bearers were all there for six years, for a full term.

Some people have this impression that I have come out openly because I was divested of my post. Of course, I did have my suspicions when I was thrown out of the Tamil Nadu House in New Delhi. But the post of a deputy leader of a parliamentary party is not such a significant post or a very important post. My being stripped of that post is not the reason for my speaking out. I had my suspicions all along. But it is these people, my enemies in the party, who, in a hurry, have let the cat out of the bag. They were so impatient to harass me, to remove me from all the posts I held.

The real reason I have spoken out now is that I feared that they (the coterie—Information Minister R.M. Veerappan, Finance Minister V.R. Nedunchezhiyan, P.U. Shanmugam and MGR's wife V.N. Janaki) may even expel me from the party before MGR returns, and if I am expelled from the party, I can't even demand to see MGR, even after he returns.

Jayalalitha Jayaram: suspicions about the "gang of four"

On whether the party would have taken the steps it has against her if MGR was in possession of his mental faculties:

Certainly not, and my eyes were opened to this on the night of December 31 when I was turned out of Tamil Nadu House. Unless these people were absolutely sure that MGR is not going to regain his mental faculties they wouldn't have done all that they have to me.

Now I don't question their right to issue an order, but why should they not have informed me? I could have at least made some alternative arrangements. Not that I am not able to attend to my parliamentary work because I don't have permanent accommodation in Delhi. My parliamentary papers are all still in the suite. That was my official address recorded in the Rajya Sabha Secretariat, and a lot of letters and invitations have come there. And I am not even aware of them.

from the party by Shanmugam and an average of 15 more were being expelled every day. The director-general of police, K. Mohandas, the intelligence chief and a close confidant of MGR's was abruptly transferred to an innocuous post. Another director-general of police, K. Radhakrishnan who had been personally selected by MGR was shifted to the post of director of vigilance.

With the battle lines clearly drawn, other party leaders and state ministers have been forced to make their alignments known. Electricity Minister S. Ramachandran and Education Minister C. Aranganayakam are ranged with the Jayalalitha camp while Industry Minister C. Ponnaiyan and Agriculture Minister K. Kalimuthu clearly identify with Nedunchezhiyan and Veerappan.

But the return of the chief minister may not quite provide the healing touch the party needs. Veerappan has already announced that the date of the swearing-in will only be decided after MGR has returned "and rested". In which case, Jayalalitha's fears that the coterie will rule the roost even after MGR's return may well prove true, with party leaders denied access to the chief minister.

By last fortnight, the political climate remained in a state of flux. Even Governor Khurana admitted to INDIA TODAY that "it is a very difficult situation and the choice before me seems limited. The leader of the majority party is unable to assume office immediately and nobody else seems to command a sufficient following". In the event of MGR being unable to return to active political life, it is obvious that the split in the party will be formalised. Which faction emerges with greater support in the Assembly is difficult to say but at the moment Jayalalitha is certain to have the backing of the Congress(I), judging by the detailed discussions she and Thirunavukkarasu had with Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi recently. If that eventuality does take place, the Congress(I) could find itself in a position to call the political shots in the state on the strength of its 61 newly elected members. But till then, the future of Tamil Nadu is obviously being decided in a Brooklyn hospital room. The key question is — by whom?

—S.H. VENKATRAMANI

This was premeditated harassment. Why did they keep silent for five months if I was to be deprived of my permanent suite? Does all this not indicate the mean depths to which the coterie could descend to hound and insult me?

On her plans now that the coterie is out to get her:

Until I was turned out of Tamil Nadu House, I had some hope. If MGR was really fully conscious and alert, then these people would not have had the audacity to do this. They are doing everything in MGR's name. If MGR is recovering fast and is soon going to assume office, would these people not be afraid that I will complain to him and he will question them, and if he is not mentally alert, then isn't it cruel that these people are keeping him prisoner?

If you see the arrangements they have now made to welcome MGR on his return. Apart from Nedunchezhiyan, and the chief secretary and a couple of senior police officials, nobody else is going to be allowed to go near him. One can understand the general public not being allowed to go near MGR. But why should cabinet ministers also not be allowed? After all, there are only 21 other ministers besides MGR and Nedunchezhiyan. Nedunchezhiyan has dug the last nail in the coffin. He has said that MGR will appear before the public before being taken to his residence. Are they going to exhibit him as a show-piece from a distance? And is it not clear that they did not want the earlier deputy general of police DGP K. Radhakrishnan to get a close view of MGR, and that is why they have transferred him as director of vigilance? If he had continued to be the DGP, as the chief of the police force, he must have had to be allowed into the airport.

You are doubting if I will be allowed to meet MGR even after he comes back, because the stranglehold on him appears to be complete, but then we can't be too sure till then. Let us see. If they don't allow me to see him even after his return, will that not confirm everybody's suspicions?

Her reaction to the public campaign against her in the party:

MGR was very happy with my party work. When I offered my resignation as propaganda secretary because former minister S.D. Somasundaram had complained about me, I acted on MGR's own instructions. He dictated the resignation letter to me on phone, and told me I would be reinstated soon and that he would be accepting the resignation only for political reasons. If his acceptance of the resignation was serious, then would the vacancy not have been filled up immediately?

On the two days that the general council meeting of the party was held on September 1 and 2, 1984, speaker after speaker urged that MGR should not accept my resignation, and 99 per cent of those present gave signed letters that my resignation should not be accepted. MGR collected these letters. He was very happy that I had captured the hearts of the partymen. Then on October 2, Gandhiji's birthday, MGR had assured ministers K.A. Krishnaswamy and K.S.R. Ramachandran that I would be reappointed propaganda secretary within a few days. But then he had to get sadly hospitalised before that. So the claim that MGR had criticised me at the general council is all false.

On her strength and popularity in the party:

Veerappan has no support in the party. That is why I am saying that there is no split in the party. About the legislature, it will be premature now to talk in terms of a trial of strength.

The Congress(I) is not involved in this at all. We have an independent majority. Even the bulk of the AIADMK members are not responsible for this. It is only two or three people who are holding the party and the state to ransom by virtue of their technical position. They are tarnishing the name of the AIADMK and MGR. And if I am fighting now, it is for MGR.

On whether the bluff will be called after MGR's return:

You see this coterie is going the whole hog. They are now expelling a lot of loyal members from the party. And the expulsion orders are being issued on the General Secretary P.U. Shanmugam's name. But then the governor already knows what is happening. And it is for him to act. So let us wait for MGR's return. Let us see what happens after that.

BIHAR

Call to Arms

FORMER Bihar chief minister and DMKP leader Karpoori Thakur is anything but a good loser. But diminishing support among his traditional supporters and a humiliating defeat in the Lok Sabha poll seem to have made him desperate. Last fortnight, in a highly irresponsible act smacking of political demagoguery, he asked workers at a party meeting to "collect arms, with or without licence, to face the assembly elections". The weapons, he said, were to counter poll violence and "vote looting" by the Congress(I). The meeting, if somewhat reluctantly, ratified his call to arms, and with that Bihar seemed all set for another round of blood-letting.

Saner minds reacted swiftly to Thakur's extreme—some would say extremist—harangue. The Searchlight, an English daily of Patna, said, "Thakur should not only withdraw his call but apologise for the mistake." Within the DMKP, Gautam Sagar Rana, a former parliamentary secretary, questioned the propriety of using the same tactics the Congress(I) was accused of using. DMKP Rajya Sabha member Humkumdeo Narain Yadav condemned the call for violence and counselled Thakur to quit the party leadership "voluntarily" in the interests of democracy and the Opposition. Even the Yuva Lok Dal snapped its ties with the DMKP three days after Thakur's call to militancy, in protest against his "dictatorial" attitude.

Other opposition parties and the Congress(I) were even more appalled. CPI state office secretary Sahjanand Rai said: "Since Thakur has lost faith in the people and democracy he is urging his supporters to take up arms. He is also feeling frustrated about the revolt against the leadership within the party. People should not take him seriously." Bihar Minister of State for Home Bhola Singh said Thakur was inciting civil war. Ironically, Thakur is accused of being the author of the booth-capturing and rigging he seeks to counter with violence now. Alleges Congress(I) leader Kamalnath Singh Thakur: "Everybody knows it was Thakur who introduced booth-capturing in 1967 and institutionalised rigging in Phulparas in 1978 when he managed to get an unprecedented number of votes in the assembly by-elections."

But the perverse logic behind Thakur's moves became apparent when, a week later, he revived the reservation issue. "The DMKP will wage relentless war for the achievement of this goal (68 per cent reservation) and will implement it expeditiously if voted to power," he said. His strategy seemed to be to aggravate the divide between those for and against reservation and then consolidate his position as a leader of the backward classes. "Thakur's reservation call preceded by the call to arms should not be taken lightly. It smacks of a design to set society aflame to divide the people and save his leadership," said state Congress(I) minority cell convenor Shakil-uz-Zaman. The 1978 reservation policy had virtually split the people of the state into warring camps and resulted in large-scale violence. But in the process Thakur succeeded in uniting the "backwards" and emerging as their undisputed leader.

Unfortunately, there was a dangerous tendency to justify a resort to violence on the part of too many in the DMKP. "We have finalised a war strategy to protect the booths with the help of arms, legal or illegal. During the recent Lok Sabha elections the Congress(I) had looted our votes with the help of official machinery and goondas. We can no longer tolerate this. We must reply to the Congress(I) goondaism to protect our votes," said Bihar DMKP President Ramjivan Singh. State DMKP General Secretary P.K. Sinha rationalised further: "Suppose a criminal attacks you and tries to rob you of your cash. Will you sit idle or defend yourself with all your might? In a democracy we value votes more than cash or anything else. It is natural for the people to defend the votes. Defending votes means the defence of democracy and there is nothing illegal in the call of Thakur."

Thakur's problems seem to have begun when the Lok Sabha poll was announced in November last year. Both the CPI and the Janata Party accused him of trying to sabotage seat adjustment talks among the opposition parties. To add to his problems, the Yadavs within the DMKP itself were trying to isolate him in the Mithila region that is his base. Said a senior DMKP leader: "Thakur has been bossing over the party with the help of the Yadavs but they are not in a mood to accept the leadership of a non-Yadav any more."

The Darbhanga seat, on the other hand, was won by the late L.N. Mishra's son Vijay Kumar Mishra with the united support of the Yadavs and the Maithili Brahmins. His victory signified the formalisation of the caste equation in north Bihar, particularly in the Mithila region. So estranged have the Yadavs become from Thakur that a party meeting at Hajipur was disrupted last fortnight and a former minister and Thakur supporter, Motilal Kanan, escaped a bomb attack allegedly by supporters of a Yadav leader. These developments and the approaching assembly elections reportedly unnerved Thakur enough to goad him onto his new and dangerous road.

PRESS

The Freedom Fight

THE CASE is already well known, and on its way to becoming a cause celebre in the media. Brahma Chellany, a 27-year-old correspondent of the American news agency Associated Press (AP), has been charged with sedition by the Punjab Government, the first journalist so accused in free India.

While covering Operation Bluestar last June, Chellany became the only journalist attached to a foreign agency to remain in Amritsar through it. He filed several dispatches, but the most controversial was frontpaged in The Times of London and other prestigious foreign newspapers. It claimed that several of the more than 1,000 militants exterminated in Amritsar were shot at from point blank range by troops who first tied their hands behind their backs. Chellany quoted a doctor and police officials and also claimed to have seen a number of post-mortem reports certifying the nature of the killings.

While Indian missions abroad rushed around issuing denials and registering strong protests, in October, the Punjab police raided Chellany's office and residence in New Delhi; and the Government charged him with violating Sections 153A and 295A of the Indian Penal Code (IPC) for promoting hatred between religious groups and hurting the religious sentiments of a community (INDIA TODAY, November 15, 1984). Chellany was further charged with violating Section 4 of the Punjab Special Powers Press Act of 1956 for breaking press censorship imposed in the state of Punjab. Chellany filed two petitions in the Supreme Court challenging the constitutionality of the wide-ranging Terrorist Act and the Censorship Act which, in the Punjab Government's interpretation, meant that news about Punjab appearing outside the state was also liable to censorship. The Supreme Court admitted both petitions and issued Chellany interim anticipatory bail.

But the worst was to come. In mid-November the Central Government moved the Supreme Court asking for cancellation of Chellany's bail on the grounds that a violation of the Terrorist Act was non-bailable. The court rejected the application but asked Chellany to make himself available for interrogation in Amritsar. Between November 22 and December 1, Chellany was subjected to rigorous interrogation by officials of the Intelligence Bureau, the army and also the Punjab police. "The questions related to my sources for the reports I had filed but I refused to divulge them," says Chellany. "They wanted names of the police officials, doctors conducting post-mortems on the bodies and army officers who had supplied me with information."

As a result, the Union Ministry of Home Affairs on December 4 moved another application for cancellation of Chellany's bail and the Punjab Government further charged him with sedition under Section 124A of the IPC which is defined as: "Whoever tries to bring or brings into contempt or whoever tries to incite or incites disaffection towards the Government established by law in the country is deemed to have committed an act of sedition."

This Chellany strongly refutes, claiming that the Punjab Government's application is full of "fabricated evidence against me". Since the charge of sedition is serious, and unprecedented in the history of the Indian media, support for Chellany's cause has been unstinting and widespread. Virtually all foreign media have condemned the charge and given the case wide publicity, with the New York Times carrying an editorial on the subject. The crux of the issue is contained in the AP Bureau Chief Victoria Graham's words. "The case," she says, "has grave implications for the freedom of the press in a society known for its freedoms and commitment to an open society. The most courageous journalist today could not but think twice before writing unpalatable truths, knowing that the alternative could be humiliation, harassment and jail."

Chellany is determined to fight the case in court. While his passport remains impounded, Chellany is getting a big hand from the Indian press. The Editors' Guild has come out in full support, with veteran journalist Kuldip Nayar calling the case "scandalous". Nayar, also a member of the Guild, says: "The sedition charge pertains to a specific incident. Chellany's case has no connection with having committed sedition. It simply withholds the right of a journalist to publish information."

Meanwhile, while a government has changed at the Centre, there is as yet no sign that it is going to continue pressing for cancellation of Chellany's bail. "Our apprehension that they will move the court for cancelling the bail remains," says V.M. Tarkunde who is fighting the case on behalf of Chellany. "Or they could start the prosecution in Chandigarh so that the trial is held within the parameter of the Terrorist Act. Or, given the new Government's liberal stance towards the media, they could drop the charges altogether."

Three weeks after the last legal move, all is suddenly quiet on the Government front. There are indications that, given the extensive publicity and pressure from the media, the Government will quietly drop the charges. If not, then Chellany, and his boss Graham, are going to fight it out. Although India possesses no law that effectively shields journalists from revealing their sources (the Law Commission in September 1983 submitted such a report still pending with the Government), all Indian journalists, given Chellany's precedent, can suffer.

NEW MINISTERS

STYLE AND

THE PRIME minister may be young and new and repeatedly given to making promises of a clean, efficient government, but who are his chosen men and women to implement the promises? Is Rajiv Gandhi's council of ministers made of the stuff that constitutes an incorruptible and efficient administration? Does their previous track record show them as dynamic people—proficient in institutional administration, speedy as decision-makers and innovative as instruments of change? Do they, in fact, look like potential deliverers in a government committed to delivering the goods?

Three weeks into their new jobs, the new ministers have been leading a rushed life: attending Parliament, preparing for the assembly elections and some, like Minister of State for Power Arun Nehru and Minister of State for Planning K.R. Narayanan, relegated to their sick-beds in the capital's cold wave. Narayanan frankly admitted that, a bad bout of bronchitis apart, he was in no position to talk because "I simply don't know too much about my department yet." Others were eager to air their views, like the debonair Minister of State for Railways Madhavrao Scindia, who promptly answered a call and fixed an appointment himself. Others begged off, like Margaret Alva, minister of state for parliamentary affairs, arguing that parliamentary duty kept her on her toes round the clock, then relented when she was traced to her home, ready to go to bed by 8.30 p.m. A few were simply unreachable such as the Union Railway Minister Bansi Lal.

Given the exigencies of Parliament in session, preparations for the assembly poll and the business of settling down in their ministries, the question remained: what's new about the new ministers?

To begin with, not all that many are new. In the Union Cabinet of the 14 ministers excluding the prime minister, five are new, but with the exception of former Bihar chief minister Abdul Ghafoor, now minister for works and housing, all possess previous ministerial experience at the Centre. Of the six ministers of state holding independent charge of ministries, two are new this time but have served in earlier ministries in New Delhi. And of the 19 ministers of state, only eight, less than half that is, have no earlier experience of handling a ministry. Of these, three are new to Parliament: former diplomats Natwar Singh and K.R. Narayanan, now ministers of state for steel and planning respectively, and R.K. Jaichandra Singh from Manipur who is minister of state for youth affairs and sports. While the last is a newcomer in every sense, the erstwhile career diplomats can claim vast experience of dealing with the Government, having worked for it.

Not all that many ministers are that young either. In the Cabinet, the prime minister himself, at 40, is the youngest followed by Health Minister Mohsina Kidwai, 52, and Education Minister K.C. Pant, 53. Among ministers of state, the youngest are Industry and Company Affairs Minister Arif Mohammed Khan, 33, and Parliamentary Affairs Minister Ghulam Nabi Azad, 35. Both, however, have served as ministers of state before, so the honour of being the youngest new candidate for ministership goes to the ebullient ex-Maharaja of Gwalior, Madhavrao Scindia, who is 39.

Considerations of age, experience and availability for interviews aside, what do these people make of their new jobs and the new regime? What are their concerns, their priorities, their beliefs?

There are the traditional yes-men, whose chief concern is parroting eternal gratidute and loyalty to Rajiv. There are some more sophisticated who already sound like abbreviated Rajiv clones: their conversation is liberally peppered with phrases like "man management", uses of "new computer technology" and propelling the ministry "into the 21st century". And there are the sound ones who, through a mixture of shrewdness, smoothness, reliability and scrupulousness have come up in the right places.

A prime example of this category is Vishwanath Pratap Singh, the new minister for finance, commerce and supply, counted as the second most important member of the Cabinet after the prime minister. He has the credentials; as a scion of the ruling family of a feudality called Manda not far from Allahabad, he has breeding, education and a private income. In the summer of 1980, the late Sanjay Gandhi, conscious of his clean, sound image promoted him as chief minister of Uttar Pradesh. He has the reputation: two years later Singh became the first chief minister in the country to resign voluntarily (on moral grounds, he said) when he could not fulfil his vow of eliminating the dacoits within a promised period. Mrs Gandhi rehabilitated him in January 1983, bringing him into her cabinet as commerce minister. For a year-and-a-half, he served admirably, one of the few effective cabinet ministers. He actually cleaned up the ministry, computerising its organisation for efficiency, and braved the beef tallow scandal by suspending the import licences of 193 companies. Last summer Mrs Gandhi sent him back to Uttar Pradesh as party chief to prepare for the elections, and he succeeded admirably in the job.

Now 51, he occupies a massive, oak panelled office in North Block, more glamorously furnished than the prime minister's. He's not a man of words, and has a joking habit of fielding the questions back. "No time for feelings," he says when asked what it feels like to be in the job. "It's a time for keeping mum." He refuses to speak about areas of action, protesting that he cannot before the Government's first budget is out. But there is promise of serious re-evaluation and possible revamping: non-resident investment and functioning of banks will be properly looked into; foreign exchange generation will be promoted; repayment of foreign loans expedited and reinvestment outside the Government sector encouraged. He has recommended that the ministers of industry, finance, agriculture and commerce meet every month to draw broad policy parameters and jointly apprise the prime minister every alternate month. "So that there isn't a truncated view of the Government, and that it's not government departments but the Government of India that is expected to deliver the goods."

His cabinet colleague K.C. Pant, now minister for education is more explicit: "The style and idiom of the new prime minister is different. He often talks of taking India into the 21st century; in that sense, he's much more attuned to modern technology, and familiar with its application."

Pant, son of Govind Ballabh Pant, was a member of Mrs Gandhi's cabinet for over a decade, handling a variety of portfolios. After the Congress defeat in 1977, he quit the party but rejoined after 1980. Later Mrs Gandhi made him chairman of the Energy Commission, a job of cabinet rank. A low-key, conscientious, ponderous-looking man, Pant is an old-fashioned plodder: being MP from New Delhi constituency as well as serving as Union minister in New Delhi isn't an easy combination. Pant puts in a 14-hour-day at least, juggling attendance at local kavi sammelans with serious matters of state.

How dexterously he manages is clear from the target areas of attention he has earmarked in education. He is clear, incisive and open to suggestion. Universalisation of elementary education by 1990 (as many as 24 per cent, or 6 crore children, do not enrol for primary education), induction of non-normal education to take the pressure off colleges, emphasis on adult education (11 crore illiterates in the age group 15-55) are all priorities. There is the concept of de-linking degrees from jobs—"something that has to be worked out but is desirable". And there is the idea of strengthening school education (which gets poorer) by setting up pacesetter schools, cleaning up colleges, introducing computers in polytechnics. All these are constrained by shortage of funds, power and maintenance facilities. "It will take time," says Pant "but I will push all the elements of the programmes. There is need to consult the states and redefine the last document of education policy which came out in 1968. It's a big challenge but we have got the big mandate to be able to meet it."

Does the massive mandate make action more imperative? "Of course," says the new Minister for Works and Housing Abdul Ghafoor who was woken up in New Delhi during his afternoon snooze on December 31 by the prime minister and invited to Rashtrapati Bhavan for the oath-taking. "Rajivji is restless. He wants his ideas implemented fast. He is also receptive and welcomes suggestions from his colleagues."

Ghafoor, 68, has never been either MP or a Central minister but, barring a brief period in 1967, he has been an MLA from Gopalganj, the town where he was born, since 1952. He became chief minister of Bihar during the JP movement but was removed during the Emergency and replaced by Jagannath Mishra. Known as "Chacha" back home, his clean, matter-of-fact, upright style has stood him in good stead.

In New Delhi, he is going to embark upon an immediate clean up of the Delhi Development Authority (DDA). "I will not stand for corruption at any level. I've already set up a review panel at the DDA to return officials who have completed their tenures." A sign of his style: as works and housing minister he hasn't pushed for immediate allotment of an official residence himself, and is quite happy in his flat in an MP's hostel.

BHAWAN SINGH

"I haven't a broad horizon in politics. What matters is my dedication to the (Gandhi) family"

HANS RAJ BHARADWAJ, minister of state for law

In colourful comparison to their sedate senior colleagues are the ministers of state, a motley crowd that never fails to surprise. There is the Minister of State for Labour, T. Anjaiah, who held the same portfolio, till he was appointed chief minister of Andhra Pradesh in 1981. The two best-known facts about him are: that he started life as a labourer in the Allwyn factory in Hyderabad and that, as chief minister, he had his head snapped off by Rajiv Gandhi when he loudly arrived to receive him, band, bunting and all, at Begumpet airport. He was one of the Congress candidates to win the election from Andhra Pradesh, and his top priority is to advise the Centre in remedying "the Andhra situation".

Now 55, he sits grandly beneath a portrait of Mrs Gandhi festooned with tinsely garlands. "Madam made me minister of state. Madam made me chief minister. Now I'm back. I never wanted to go back to the state. I never wanted to come here. All their decision," he says, with a touching humility that takes precedence over form. His other priorities are bringing the following amendments to labour laws: to allow provident fund loans for building houses, a revision of public sector wage policy, payment of bonus and DA in accordance with income slabs and payment of gratuity to workers during industrial lock-outs. Asked about the airport incident Anjaiah dismisses it with a wave of the hand. "Only a little misunderstanding," he tersely grunts.

LESS keen to forget her longstanding connection with the Gandhi family is Maragatham Chandrashekhar, 67, minister of state for women and social welfare with independent charge. For the first time, women have a separate ministry, with the Department of Social Welfare attached. But it cannot be fairly said that Chandrashekhar either understands the importance of her job or substantively knows what she is talking about. True, she has some vague notions that "women must realise they are individuals too" and "women must be helped to help themselves" and so on. And last fortnight, she called a meeting of women MP's (whose number has gone up from 22 to 36 in the Lok Sabha, the highest ever) to deliberate these notions, but she gets eloquent only on the subject of the Gandhi family.

Her conversation then becomes afflicted with deep sighs. "Tell you about my relationship with Mrs Gandhi? Where do I begin? Where do I end?" Sigh. "I am a loyal soldier of the party—Gandhiji, Nehruji, Indiraji and now, Rajivji, I am prepared to serve them all." Sigh again. "I am lucky to have had the opportunity to serve the prime minister and grateful to him that he has given me the chance." Ocean of sighs.

If such remarks strike an inappropriate note, Chandrashekhar's career graph is clear indication of how long—and how far—inappropriate people can make it in politics. A teacher by profession, she won the first election to the Lok Sabha from Tamil Nadu in 1952, but was defeated both in 1957 and 1967. From 1967 to 1969 she obtained a sinecure of commissioner for linguistic minorities. In 1970 she was nominated to the Rajya Sabha and renominated again for another term. This time she was elected to the Lok Sabha from Tamil Nadu. The reasons for her rise could be many but they are as likely as not contained in the line: "Mrs Gandhi was, is, will always be my heroine."

Equally at sea in his new environment is Bir Sain, the minister of state for environment. His apppointment undoubtedly raised the most eyebrows. A faceless politician from Uttar Pradesh who was not considered ministerial material even in his own state till last July when he was yanked out of virtual wilderness and given state cabinet rank when Narain Dutt Tiwari took over as chief minister. Sain's induction into the prestigious department of environment, is obviously to cater to the Harijan lobby. Sain is another one who pays worshipful lip service to the Gandhi name. "Environment is an important subject for Rajivji. It is a rare privilege to work under a young and dynamic prime minister."

That Sain is a square peg in a round hole was quite obvious from the first day he occupied his plush office in Bikaner House. He displayed his total ignorance of the job when he summoned a meeting of his officials and asked them what steps were being taken "to preserve the dinosaur".

A similar rise is that of Hans Raj Bhardwaj, the new minister of state for law and justice. A Delhi-based advocate, Bhardwaj, 47, traces his Gandhi connection to the time when his father served Nehru as security officer. "I haven't a broad horizon in politics. What matters is my dedication to the family," he admits frankly. His ideas of bringing about law reform, simplifying the legal system, effecting speedy justice, cutting down the cost of litigation, are also notional.

A stout, jolly-faced fellow, he has the easy-going, expedient manner of a petition clerk perhaps, or a coffee-house buff. Between borrowing cigarettes, his hands remain folded on his belly. "The basic edifice of our laws is sound," he says. Still, some of the things he'd like to do include amendments to penal code and criminal code, set up a directorate to research laws and update jail manuals.

BHARDWAJ'S background is of a man undoubtedly self-made (as the eldest son in the family he supported himself with a variety of jobs, from journalism to export house salesman, to obtain his law degree) but somewhere along the way he relinquished the path of excellence for convenience. He was standing counsel for the Delhi administration between 1971 and 1977 and, when the Gandhi family fell on hard times, he was there. "I defended everybody, Sanjay Gandhi, Bansi Lal, V.C. Shukla. Sanjay used to be with me 18 hours a day. I even defended Dhirendra Brahmachari. "But," a small chuckle here, "as you know he has been eliminated by The Leader."

Another lawyer who has lately come to ministership is Margaret Alva, 42, one of the two ministers of state for parliamentary affairs. An elected member of the Rajya Sabha since 1974, she is an exuberant, intelligent and articulate woman who is also the national convener of the newly autonomous women's wing of the party, now called the Mahila Congress. "Let's talk about what we've done already," she says. "Parliament has been debating the Anti-Defection Bill for 12 years and, we, with the cooperation of the Opposition, have got it going in our first session." Does she plan any innovations in her job? Yes. She's planning to arrange study groups and seminars for MP's, coordinate with ministries to convert ordinances into legislation speedily, plus selecting speakers, setting up parliamentary committees and managing debates.

Compared to some of her colleagues, she is bursting with enthusiasm, idealism and new approaches—three words she uses repeatedly to describe the new Parliament. "Many things will happen. And fast," she says before being submerged from view by a tide of women ticket-seekers on her doorstep.

More of Alva's prescribed ingredients for action—enthusiasm, idealism—are available in a more relaxed encounter with Madhavrao Scindia, the new minister of state for railways. He adds his own adjectives of exciting, challenging and born-again efficiency to his job. "Other ministries may have more glamour, but railways gets you into the nitty-gritty of a challenge." Scindia argues vehemently for a restoration of resources to be able to "take Indian Railways into the next century". He's lucky, he says exuberantly. At least, he has Bansi Lal to work for. "With his reputation as a go-getter he'll be able to galvanise action. And I'll be there to assist him."

Meanwhile, Scindia has developed his own nine-point programme to restore the railways: punctuality, safety, cleanliness, passenger amenities, new technology, elimination of wastage, better man management et al. His second week in office, he began monitoring the movements of 60 trains selected at random to check out delays.

What about the Railway Ministry, itself one of the slowest, biggest, most intrigue-ridden. departments of the Government? Scindia thinks it's a question of better man management. "The man at the lowest rung must feel part of the decision making-apparatus." To this end, he's going to introduce seminars and group discussions among the 1.8 million railway employees, introduce better working conditions, some system of rewards for efficiency and ensure that regional general managers are mobile to carry their instructions out.

His pet ideas are two; both have been suggested before, found untenable, and shelved. One is centralise railway catering, so that the hundreds of contracts and subcontracts are eliminated; and the other is to start a corporation, similar to Air-India's Hotel Corporation, which will establish cheap, clean and efficient hotels on railway land at major junction towns.

Of his dealing with the prime minister, he says: "You can take the guidelines from him, rather than bother him with details for implementation. We're here to produce results and will produce them."

As determinedly action-oriented as Scindia is the other new high-flying minister, Natwar Singh. Ambassador to Pakistan, secretary-general of NAM, chief coordinator of CHOGM, president of the Delhi Gymkhana Club and now MP from Bharatpur, he lists his hobbies as: "Reading, writing, tennis, walking and good conversation followed by prolonged periods of reflective silence."

Actually, he's a bit short on the last in life. He sits, all solemn attention and brisk repartee, behind a large desk with three low-slung steel lamps spotlighting his face. At 54, he's the long-standing, time-honoured bureaucrat who's successfully crossed the fence to become the man who issues orders. What does it feel like? "Quite nice," he replies, tilting back in his swivel chair.

One of the first actions he took upon assuming office was to ban the serving of tea. "Now no tea. No refreshment of any kind. Don't serve anybody," he says in his clipped Cambridge accent (Corpus Christi, circa 1951). Extraordinary as that may seem, Singh isn't planning to sit around in steel either. He's been visiting the steel plants (checking in his own baggage at the airport) and is about to restore the work ethic, discipline and punctuality in his ministry; action will be "result-oriented and accountable" from now on. "I mean," he expostulates, "we've sunk in crores and crores of rupees. My job is to turn it around from from red to black," he adds of an industry that continues to lose half a crore of rupees a day.

ASKED if there was a decision on the Government's proposal to decanalise steel imports (a high-ranking committee of secretaries hotly debated the subject last fortnight) Singh said he didn't know; he only read about it in the newspapers. His formula for a turnaround is to take a close look at the problems. He plans to arrange a round-table with men from the public and private sector. "Our chaps will just listen."

Later, speaking of his constituency, Singh enunciates the miseries of rural life: 75 per cent of the villages have no roads, 65 per cent have no electricity. "After being in the Government, I have a slight advantage. I know how officialdom works. Officials can't pull a fast one." For all that, Singh understands that the danger of his party receiving such a huge mandate is that the expectations aroused are so high. "I don't have an Alladin's lamp," he confesses. "People mustn't expect anything magical." What about the new prime minister—what is it like being in his team. "Oh, he's very quick," says Natwar Singh, "he keeps us on our toes all the time?"

Does he? It wouldn't seem so from meeting some of his ministers. Some may be trying to dig in their toes, others hardly have their toes touching the ground, they're so pleased being there. So what's new about the new ministers? Finance Minister V.P. Singh was right. Very little. On the negative side, there will now be seminars instead of committees, no tea instead of more tea, obsequies to Rajivji in place of Indiraji.

On the positive side, the prime minister has repeatedly said that his ministers will be watched, and dropped, if they fail to perform; and their grace period he promises will be short. But who knows. At least most of the ministers have begun talking about moving into the 21st century 15 years in advance. Something may even get done.

SWITCHING SIDES

THE BELGIAN subsidiary of the US multinational, ITT, may walk away with the collaboration contract for setting up the proposed Bangalore factory that will manufacture switching equipment for telephone exchanges. Earlier, the Government had decided to sign up with the French giant, CIT Alcatel, on the lines of a similar agreement with CIT Alcatel for another switching factory coming up at Gonda in Uttar Pradesh. But the Bangalore collaboration issue is now undergoing reconsideration because of ITT's offer of its System 12. ITT has also proposed as part of a package deal that the Government buy 2 lakh switching lines outright. ITT's system is said to be more modern than the French counterpart, but any reconsideration is almost certain to raise a hornet's nest because other rivals in the business have not been allowed to submit fresh offers.

BUDGET BLUES

WITH preparations under way for finalising both the Union Budget as well as the Central and state annual plans for 1985-86, the Government has discovered that its financial position is bleaker than usual. The Central budget deficit is expected to be in the region of Rs 2,300 crore, against the original budget estimate of Rs 1,762 crore, while several state governments have run up overdrafts that total another Rs 2,000 crore. Meanwhile, annual plan discussions with the Planning Commission show that the plan outlays for next year will show no increase for several state governments as well as for quite a few Central ministries. In some cases, the outlays may even be smaller than the outlays for the current financial year.

RECORDER REVERSAL

THE GOVERNMENT is getting ready to do an about turn on its licensing policy for video cassette recorders (VCR's). Over the last couple of years, letters of intent have been handed out to virtually all comers, with the typical capacity limit being as small as 500 VCR's per annum. The new policy now being finalised is likely to be far more restrictive, with three or four large companies being allowed substantial capacities and everyone else being excluded from the field. A short list of applicants has already been prepared, and a final decision is expected in the next few weeks. If the revised policy goes through, the small-scale sector will be virtually excluded from the field in the future, and only large companies will be allowed entry.

TYRE TROUBLE

WITH inadequate demand hitting the tyre industry and many producers registering either losses or only marginal profits, all those who had been considering an entry into the business with capacities of a million tyres each are unlikely to go through with their project proposals. Larsen & Toubro, considered a certain entrant at one stage, had in fact been negotiating a collaboration arrangement with the French tyre giant Michelin. But L&T has developed second thoughts on the subject, and government officials say their proposal is now not under active consideration. Meanwhile, Nirlon of Bombay is considering an entry through a joint venture with the Gujarat State Industrial Development Corporation (GSIDC), which already holds a letter of intent.

SHARING DIVIDENDS

TEA COMPANIES have done well by their shareholders during 1983-84, following the unprecedented boom in the industry. Most tea companies have stepped up dividend payments sharply, and an analysis of dividend trends by Business Standard shows that six of the top 12 dividend announcements during the year came from tea companies.

Chart by B.K. SHARMA

These were Makum Tea (45 per cent dividend), Jutlibari Tea (40 per cent), Tengpani Tea (40 per cent), Assam Frontier (36 per cent), Tata Tea (35 per cent) and Kalasa Tea (35 per cent). None of these companies had declared more than a 25 per cent dividend during the previous year.

COMMUNICATION BREAKTHROUGH

NON-RESIDENT technical experts of Indian origin may be involved in a big way in several key technological and industrial programmes during the coming months. The first such programme involving a critical input from non-residents was the project to design and develop an indigenous telephone switching system, under the banner of the Centre for Development of Telematics (CDOT). Proposals have now been made for launching similar projects for the development of a microwave communication system that will obviate the need for troublesome telephone cables, and for improving the performance of the country's power stations. While the proposals are still in the initial stages of preparation, CDOT itself has made considerable progress in developing a switch that is expected to be infinitely simpler than the ones available with multinational corporations. The CDOT design allows for the use of far fewer types of printed circuit boards, for instance, and will cost half the price of equivalent systems developed elsewhere.

LABOUR

The People Problem

EVERYONE has his pet theory about what is wrong with the Indian economy and what should be done to put it right. Businessmen are apt to believe that there would be a miraculous improvement in industry and allied sectors if only they were given a free hand with licences and finance, and they are probably right, though only up to a point. Farmers tend to think that their own sector would do much better if prices were right—prices of farm products as well as inputs like power, water, fertilisers etc and they too have a point. Those who manage the economy and are responsible for drawing up realistic five-year plans have often argued that they could have much bigger plans, and therefore much higher targets, if only they could lay their hands on more resources, which also seems fair enough. Since higher industrial output and more foodgrains are fully compatible with bigger resources what is it that is holding up the works?

Businessmen's impatience with controls is understandable but even if all controls were removed and the Industries (Development & Regulation) Act scrapped along with MRTP and other hurdles, I doubt whether industry would be able to make a quantum jump into the future. As far as I know, there are no controls in Britain and British businessmen are free to do what they like with their money, or other people's money they are able to lay hands on, but this has not made any difference to Britain's decline as an industrial power since World War II. On the other hand, agriculture in Europe is beset with controls of one kind and another, but the mountain of foodstuffs in that continent keeps on growing. Controls may be a nuisance, but the real reasons for our stagnation lie elsewhere.

If you look carefully at our national income table, you will see that there has been something of a sea change in the economy over the last 20 years, though we don't notice it. According to the World Bank—I am quoting World Bank figures as they are useful for international comparisons—the share of agriculture in India has come down from 50 per cent in 1960 to 33 per cent in 1982, which means that agriculture is not such a dominant sector as it used to be. The share of industry has gone up from 20 to 26 per cent and that of services from 30 to 41 per cent. India is no more an agricultural country in the strict sense of the word, as only a third of its national income is derived from that sector. There are not many such countries in the Third World and even in China agriculture accounts for 37 per cent of its gross domestic product.

> It is obvious that we have a tremendous volume of surplus labour in agriculture which is acting as a drag on the entire economy.

However, this transformation is not reflected in our labour force. The percentage of labour in agriculture barely moved from 74 to 71 per cent between 1960 and 1982, that is by less than 4 per cent in 22 years, and the change in other sectors was also more or less on the same minute scale. Actually real transformation takes place only when there are large-scale movements in the labour force, from one major sector to another, as also, within the same sector, from one industry to another. For instance, in middle-income economies like the Philippines, there has been a sharp diversion in labour force away from agriculture, from 77 per cent to nearer 55 per cent between 1960 and 1982. In upper middle-income countries, the drop is even sharper, from 50 to 30 per cent.

It is obvious therefore that we have a tremendous volume of surplus labour in agriculture, which may provide ready-made votebanks to Charan Singh and Sharad Joshi but is acting as a drag on the entire economy. Going by international trends, we should have no more than 60 per cent of our labour force working in agriculture instead of 70 per cent, which means that we have in our villages and elsewhere a surplus of 35 million people who should not be there at all and who should have been provided with jobs in other sectors. It is these people who migrate to towns and cities and turn them into slums. It is not their fault, of course, for they will go any place where they can find a living. By the end of the century, the number of such people will grow to something like 100 million, for going by past trends, it is unlikely that the labour force in farming will fall below 68 per cent, while it should be no more than 50 per cent.

It is wrong to think of economic growth as if it was just a question of producing more—more foodgrains, more steel, more oil etc. Production helps but the effort comes up against a big wall unless you take care of structural changes and move populations in large chunks from villages to towns, from towns to cities, and often within cities and towns. In India, such large-scale movements are not possible unless we have new towns, or new housing in old towns to take care of the exodus.

In advanced countries, about three-quarters of the population lives in cities and in England the percentage is as high as 90 per cent. Urbanisation is a worldwide trend and seems as inescapable as the change in the pattern of national income. We have to think of urbanisation as an inevitable by-product of development and plan accordingly. There are 65 cities in the United States with a population of 5 lakh and above while there are only 36 such cities in India, though we have more than thrice its population. China incidentally has 78 and Soviet Russia 50. We need maybe 120 by 1999, if not earlier, and if I were a member of the Planning Commission, I should begin with my first new town immediately. When you build cities, you need steel and cement and coal and power, and there is no better way of pushing your gross national product.

When you draw surplus labour away from farms, the farmers are forced to go in for mechanisation and labour-saving devices which indirectly help industries making farm implements, apart from increasing productivity on the farms. But you cannot draw labour away unless you provide them with jobs elsewhere and this can be done only in new townships, as the old ones are bursting at the seams and can no more accommodate the exodus. You just cannot keep an economy on the move without a mobile population and ours is anything but mobile. There are jobs by the thousand in Bombay but try getting a 10 by 10 room without making a big hole in your savings!

EXPORT POLICY

Recommending Change

HEFTIER tax cuts. More replenishment (REP) licences to import raw materials and capital goods. A free rein to big business and foreign-controlled companies to enter export production areas hand-picked by the Government. Beefed up subsidies to compensate exporters more fully for taxes levied on raw materials. And an economy that may be thrown open to the winds of foreign competition.

To most businessmen, most of these goodies would have seemed a mirage a few years ago. But dream may turn into reality if two committes on export have their way. The committee on trade policy headed by former commerce secretary S. Abid Hussain has handed in a report to the Government which proposes sweeping changes in the rules of the export game and a sharp right turn in industrial licensing policy. Earlier, another committe on engineering and capital goods export chaired by D.V. Kapur, heavy industry secretary, submitted recommendations that meet many long-standing demands of businessmen.

The two reports together presage a formal break with the past that has been a long time coming. Out will go yesterday's ideological baggage. In will come what is viewed as a more pragmatic, results-geared approach in which exports will be viewed as part and parcel of total industrial activity instead of in isolation. As one exporter puts it: "You can't eat half a chicken and expect the other half to lay eggs." And Planning Commission member Abid Hussain adds: "We are in the post-Nehru era and the economy has to move into the 21st century."

High hopes are clearly pinned on the Hussain Committee report. For one, even before it was handed in bang on schedule on December 31, its contents were the object of intense media speculation. Secondly, it has pitched expectations of a radical revamping of the export and industrial system high. The 100-page report is under wraps, but the committee is believed to have advanced the following suggestions:

► Permission to exporters to import capital goods without paying duty on them, and to industry to import technology under the less restrictive open general licence (OGL).

► Full compensation to exporters for non-refundable taxes levied on export product inputs: the cash compensatory support (CCS) subsidy which the Government now pays exporters doesn't cover all such taxes, it is argued.

Hussain

Kapur

The reports submitted by both Abid Hussain and D.V. Kapur signal a formal break with the past, and the likely advent of a more pragmatic, result-oriented approach to exports.

► Export promotion councils should graduate into commodity boards, over which the Government exercises greater control.

The committee considered various options to smoothen the path to exports and increase export profitability: bidding farewell to the "red book" which lists items importers are barred from bringing into the country, devaluing the rupee and tinkering with tariffs. Some of these were shot down by Finance Ministry representatives on the committee and the more radical recommendations were watered down to arrive at a unanimous report. But a consensus was reached and a target set of doubling exports to the Rs 20,000 crore level by the next decade.

The Hussain and Kapur Committee reports overlap in at least one area—the perception that industry is backward and suffers from technological, qualitative and cost disadvantages compared with foreign competitors. Both committees therefore prescribe relaxed guidelines on buying know-how from abroad, keener competition among domestic companies and strengthening the subsidy system, even if indirectly, though the Hussain committee is believed to have suggested that subsidies be gradually phased out.

The Kapur report advocates selectivity or restricting export drives to a few countries that can buy engineering goods from India, and to a few domestic industries endowed with cost advantages. "There is a good chance of bringing these industries to internationally competitive levels through upgrading technology, introducing viable scales of production and ensuring greater domestic competition by generating substantial additional capacities in excess of domestic demand," the report argues. Included in a long, graded list of "thrust industries" are commercial vehicles, machine tools, auto spares and ancillaries, chemical and process plants, castings and forgings, bicycles and bicycle parts, industrial valves, air compressors, diesel engines and process pumps. The Kapur report is all for carrots being dangled before these 'thrust industries' to generate the export surpluses required—manufacturers should be allowed to borrow up to four times their equity capital, jump the queue for loans from financial institutions, and be provided rail fare subsidies. Other carrots indude more REP licences to import raw materials and capital goods and higher direct tax incentives linked to export performance. The report also backs the entry into thrust industries of big business and companies regulated by the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act.

The latest official initiative on the export front is underpinned by a third report on exports, a World Bank study titled India: Light Industrial Export and Finance. Drawing on the examples of the light engineering and leather industries, the report concludes that high rates of protection (import bans, quotas, tariffs, and industrial controls) in the domestic market, restrictions on capacity utilisation and expansion and on access to foreign technology have limited India's export performance and potential, and made local industry inefficient and technologically obsolete. With domestic sales being vastly more profitable than exports for manufacturers, only residual production is exported. The bank's solution to the problem: allow firms of all sizes to grow naturally by not restricting domestic capacity, stop reserving the production of certain products for the small-scale sector, or at least of products with recognised export potential, and throw open the economy to increased foreign competition.

Some of the bank's recommendations have clearly struck a responsive chord in the Kapur and Hussain committees, some of whose proposals are less than original. Points out economist B. Bhattacharyya of the Indian Institute of Foreign Trade: "The need for competition in sectors of the Indian economy was commented on in the sixth plan draft document."

But for all that, the most concentrated official look at exports in recent years, represented by the Kapur and Hussain reports, has been triggered off by worrisome realities. First, as a government economist points out, the international soft loan era has drawn to a close. Secondly, repayment of the International Monetary Fund loan is scheduled to begin this year. Finally, the export track record has been lacklustre, despite government protestations to the contrary. A Commerce Ministry official informed the Estimates Committee of Parliament last year that exports had grown by 4 per cent, 16 per cent and 13 per cent in 1980-81, 1981-82, and 1982-83, respectively, in the face of declining or stagnant world trade. But the World bank report notes that Bank missions "found concern among key officials that strategies, policies and institutional measures that may have worked in the past are not yielding the desired results in industrial or export growth".

Some of the rise in exports reported can be attributed to inflation and the sharp upswing in the dollar in recent years. Indian exporters who are paid in US currency for the goods they sell abroad, have earned more rupees, thus inflating export statistics expressed in rupees. Concurs an economist: "Some of the rise in exports is a monetary illusion and the figures must be deflated by 10 to 20 per cent to arrive at a truer picture of our export performance." The country's share of total global trade is under 0.5 per cent, and almost a quarter of its exports go to the socialist bloc, much of this being paid for in non-convertible currencies.

A few economists, export promotion agency officials and frontline exporters endorse the World Bank diagnosis and blame the export and industrial system for the meagre export showing. "Policy formulation and implementation have so "Unless reports are quickly accepted they lose their relevance."

BINAY KUMAR
vice-chairman, Foreign Trade Committee, FICCI

far loaded the dice against exports. The Government made sure that domestic profits remained high and markets were protected from competition. So business had no reason to export," says an economist who works for a government agency. And Binay Kumar, chairman of Benares House, who is also vice-chairman of the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry's foreign FICCI trade committee, points to the drawbacks built into the export structure. "Export houses are supposed to export 10 to 20 per cent more every year to be eligible for the wide range of benefits available to them. But they funnel exports borrowing export-billed items from small manufacturers and others. There is no real addition to exports."

"The idea that liberal imports and a more open economy will lead to more efficient production is not corroborated by the Japanese experience."

DR PRABHAT PATNAIK
economist, Jawaharlal Nehru University

Few would quarrel with such diagnoses; it's the prescriptions that are questioned. Says economist Prabhat Patnaik of New Delhi's Jawaharlal Nehru University: "The idea that liberal imports and a more open economy will lead to a more efficient production point is not corroborated by the Japanese experience." Japan had a very strict import regime in the fifties, a tight labour policy, government controls that favoured business, and a carefully planned export drive—conditions that cannot be easily duplicated here since a degree of authoritarianism would be called for. The international trade climate is much more protectionist now, and liberalising imports to create efficiency will lead to higher import bills. "The quantum of exports that would be achieved by liberalisation is questionable and the short-term cost will be too high," Patnaik adds.

Nonetheless, with fewer hassles and a heightened status for exports in the air, the business world last fortnight was buoyed by the committees' proposals as reported in the press. Explains G. Chandrakant, secretary-general of the Federation of Indian Export Organisations (FIEO): "Minimising controls would mean fewer procedures and fewer opportunities for administrative hindrances." But with questions such as how many of the recommendations would meet with government approval and how quickly remain unanswered, businessmen were nevertheless keeping their fingers crossed. Observes H.S. Sandhu, chairman of Chinar Exports Pvt Ltd, a trading house whose turnover may actually go as high as Rs 60 crore this year: "Very little follow-up action is taken on such reports and officials who implement them often do so half-heartedly."

The earlier Alexander Committee report and the Tandon Committee report on exports were only partially successful in nudging the Government down the road to liberalisation, in the latter's case because it adopted extreme positions. But this time round officialdom seems bent on trying out new prescriptions for an old ailment, flak or no flak. With economists pushing for efficiency in export sectors by setting up capacities in the public sector if the private sector is unwilling to oblige, and by setting up the rate of investment in plant capacity, with those in the industry who will be squeezed by the freer imports primed to kick up a storm, a debate on the Government's new export and industrial policies can be safely predicted in the months ahead.

CEMENT

A Mini Boom

THE STILLNESS of the undulating wilderness of Hosadurga taluk in Karnataka is broken occasionally by the dull thump of a hammer mill. Puffs of smoke rise from one of the hillocks like Red Indian signals. And the smoke does indeed tell a story: of the coming of age of mini-cement plants.

The source of the activity in Hosadurga's no-man's land is Veda Cements, acknowledged in industry circles as the country's first successfully run mini-cement plant. Wiping cement dust from his white hair, Gurkar Puttabuddi, Veda's 50-year-old managing director, says modestly: "We make just about enough cement that goes out as waste from the chimneys of a large cement unit every day." But that quantity is enough to keep his company solidly in the black. Churning out an average of 50 tonnes daily, Veda has in its three-year existence produced 40,000 tonnes of cement, enough to build 11,000 two-bedroom houses. It now employs 300 people, has built up an investment reserve of Rs 30 lakh, expanded its capacity to 90 tonnes a day, and even shown a modest profit this year.

Veda heralds a belated mini-cement boom in Karnataka. Six years ago, the Janata government in New Delhi had tried hard to push the concept of mini-cement plants (with a capacity of less than 200 tonnes per day). It had extended excise concessions, tried to iron out technological problems, and in other ways pushed hard for a concept that was believed to be viable as a low-investment high-employment alternative to large plants. Mini-cement plants were supposed to be especially viable for tapping scattered limestone deposits in hilly and inaccessible areas, where cement would thus be locally available instead of having to be transported from long distances.

For a variety of reasons, the idea failed to gell. The government-owned financial institutions were not keen, and entrepreneurs were unwilling to invest in what seemed like a losing proposition. In fact, the Industrial Development Bank of India refused to provide any money to Veda Cements for over a year, and reluctantly agreed to the project on an "experimental basis". But Veda's success has changed all that.

Following close on Veda's heels was Lokapur Cements, located in the bush country of Bijapur district, 300 km from Hosadurga. Started six months after Veda, Lokapur too has turned the profit corner. And these two success stories have helped open the floodgates: three prospective entrepreneurs walk into the offices of the state government-owned Technical Consultancy Services Organisation (Tecsok) every day, wanting to start mini-cement units. Already, 132 proposed projects have been registered. And by the end of next month, three more mini-cement plants will begin production, to be followed by eight more Gurkar Puttabuddi's mini-cement plant was considered a risky venture, but his success has heralded the current boom in mini-cement plants.

The state Mines and Geology Department is now swamped with applications for mining leases from entrepreneurs. In some areas there are more than a dozen applications for the same limestone deposit. And Movers Pvt Ltd, which set up the units for Veda and Lokapur on a turnkey basis, now has orders to set up 30 more plants all over the country. Says Movers Director T.S. Rajamani with underplayed satisfaction: "Business is good."

Jumping on to the mini-cement bandwagon are politicians, professors, civil engineers and even a marine biologist. Puttabuddi himself is a structural engineer who used to lecture in a local college of engineering. Those who have followed in his footsteps include S. Ravindra, who used to work in his family drug distribution firm, and Pratibha Patil, daughter of a state cabinet minister who preferred a mini-cement operation to garment manufacturing. Ravindra is setting up a 30-tonne plant in collaboration with six partners, while Patil has decided to invest Rs 4 crore in a 90-tonne plant.

The boom is essentially in Karnataka, which is only natural: the state has the country's largest reserves of limestone, estimated at 18 billion tonnes. But there is a rush of applications in other states as well, including Andhra Pradesh, Gujarat and Rajasthan. These four states account for more than 70 per cent of the limestone reserves in the country.

Behind the boom lie the pioneering efforts of the Cement Research Institute, which successfully demonstrated the viability of mini-cement plants by running one in Maduvathur in Tamil Nadu, using a modified version of the century-old vertical shaft kiln technology. The institute proved that mini-cement plants could be set up with a lower capital cost than large plants (Rs 652 per tonne against Rs 900 per tonne), with shorter gestation periods, greater employment potential (four people per tonne, against two in a large plant), and at a bearable cost. The production cost is estimated at Rs 315 per tonne, compared to Rs 300 for large plants, but this difference has been more than neutralised with the help of a crucial government concession.

These high prices are, of course, vital for the viability of the mini-cement plants. In fact, the Janata thrust in this direction failed essentially because of the low prices allowed then for cement. This changed with the introduction of dual pricing for cement two years ago, and the Government has in fact withdrawn the hefty excise duty concession that mini-cement plants enjoyed till March last year. In the prevailing market situation, this has made little difference, and the profitability of the operation is borne out by the rush of entrepreneurs.

The times may get more difficult towards the end of the decade, when the large additional capacities sanctioned by the Government come into operation and the demand-supply balance shifts. But at the moment, the smoke signals spell a mini-cement boom.

SOFT DRINKS

Cola Pep

THERE might be fresh fizz in the Indian soft drinks market very soon: Pepsi Cola is making an entry, if the Government will allow it.

The leading American soft drink companies have been trying to penetrate the Indian market for the last year. Seven Up initially tried to strike a deal with the Modis, but nothing came of it. Coca-Cola itself has been trying to make a comeback after the company was asked to leave during the Janata Party rule, but without success so far. Now Pepsico has beaten both to the draw by striking a deal with an Indian company whose identity is being kept a closely-guarded secret. Speculation so far has centred on R.P. Goenka of the Duncan group and Voltas, but it is not yet certain which of the two is the chosen partner, or indeed whether any other company is involved.

The US soft drinks and snack foods giant, which ranks 43rd in the Fortune 500 list with sales of $ 8 billion (Rs 10,000 crore) last year (ahead of Coke, which ranks 48th), has already had initial exploratory talks with the Government, but a decision on allowing its entry into the country is expected to be taken at the Cabinet level.

The proposal is understood to be a complex one, tailored to deflect opposition by focusing on national priorities. Pepsico will form a new company in collaboration with its Indian partner to undertake not only the production and marketing of Pepsico's three mainline drinks (Pepsi Cola, an orange drink called Mirinda and a lime-lemon flavour called Teem) but also the export of non-traditional agro-based products from India. The US company is scouring the country for suitable export products, and has fixed on canned fruit drinks as the first possibility. It has proposed to the Government that it will undertake such exports in return for being allowed to supply imported soft drink concentrates to bottling agents, who will turn out the final product. An assurance has been given to the Government that the foreign exchange earnings on exports will be more than what is spent on importing the soft drinks concentrates, so that the country has a net foreign exchange gain on the deal.

The proposal is expected to have major political implications. The domestic soft drink manufacturers are certain to voice their opposition. On the other hand, it is argued that allowing Pepsico into India will serve to give a signal to the US Administration and American businessmen, and undo the 'damage' done by expelling Coke and IBM in 1978. The Government's decision on the Pepsico proposal will therefore have to be in essence a political one.

Two other advantages are listed in favour of the Pepsico proposal. One is that it will bring new food processing, packaging and water treatment technology into India. The other is that Pepsico's entry into the soft drinks market will not take away business from the existing manufacturers and that everyone with a presence in the industry will benefit because the total market for soft drinks will grow.

The American company's calculations show that the Indian soft drinks market is vastly under-tapped. Annual sales now total between 60 million and 80 million cases (each case has 24 bottles), which works out to two bottles per Indian per year. If the effective market (defined as those people who have the purchasing power) is assumed to be 150 million people, the per capita annual consumption is around 12 bottles. In contrast, countries like Pakistan, Egypt, Malaysia and Indonesia have a per capita consumption of 40 to 90 bottles. On the basis of this comparison, it is predicted that the Indian soft drinks market should treble in the next four to five years: Pepsico's entry into Egypt saw a doubling of soft drinks consumption, from 28 to 55 bottles.

A trebling of the market from 60 million cases annually to 180 million cases in the next five years will mean additional business worth Rs 480 crore. Most of this will go to the bottling companies, the retail agents, and to the Government (the tax revenue is expected to be over Rs 200 crore).

Whether the Government will buy these arguments remains to be seen. But the proposal will have to clear several hurdles in a number of ministries. One hurdle will be presented by the Foreign Exchange Regulations Act, under which any company with a foreign shareholding of more than 40 per cent must be in certain specified areas of activity. But the Pepsico proposal will stay clear of this because the proposed joint venture will have a foreign shareholding of less than 40 per cent. But clearance for foreign collaboration is mandatory, and it remains to be seen whether the proposal fits into the Government guidelines.

Another hurdle will be presented by the Government's policy of discouraging the use of foreign trade marks. But this is not expected to be a problem because Pepsico was in India from 1951 to 1957, and its trade marks Pepsi Cola and Mirinda are already registered in India. However, the lime-lemon flavour Teem is not registered in India, and will therefore have to clear this hurdle.

Finally, there could be problems caused by the Monopolies and Restrictive Trade Practices Act if a large Indian business house is involved, and by the industrial licensing policy. Getting past these will depend on the Government's assessment of the importance of sending a signal to international business.

Whichever way the decision goes, the issue is bound to hit the headlines in the world's financial press, in the same manner as Coke's ouster did seven years ago. And the trade-off will almost certainly be between the perceived advantages of sending a positive signal abroad and facing the storm of protest that is inevitable within the country if the Government is seen as promoting junk food. Pepsi Cola is known to be both sweeter and fizzier than Coke, and the big question now is whether this will be a sweet deal or a proposal without any fizz in it.

NATIONAL SILICON FACILITY

Messy Controversy

THE PAPERS had been signed, the decision taken, and the deal clinched. Everything about the collaboration with Hemlock Semiconductors Inc suggested that the American company would help the Government set up the Rs 92 crore National Silicon Facility (NSF)—a project designed to produce 200 tonnes annually of the one key material required for the electronics and solar energy programmes: silicon.

Suddenly, however, everything was wide open. Last month, Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi ordered a review of the collaboration decision on the ground that it was too expensive, and wanted a second look at whether Indian scientists could deliver the goods on their own. That split the country's scientific establishment down the middle, while Hemlock's East German rivals quickly reached Delhi for fresh negotiations. The German offer, though cheaper than Hemlock's, had been rejected earlier because it came too late in the day. But last month's unexpected developments now offered them a fresh chance to clinch a prestigious contract.

The Germans, however, figured only on the periphery of what had blossomed into a messy controversy, with the two main options being the Hemlock collaboration and a wholly indigenous effort that would build on the work already done by the Bangalore-based Indian Institute of Science and Mettur Chemicals, and by the National Chemical Laboratory in Pune.

The domestic option had been rejected by an official committee last year (INDIA TODAY, May 31, 1984) as being unproven, but this situation changed a couple of months ago when Mettur Chemicals submitted to the department of electronics some polysilicon that it had produced. Subsequent tests showed that the material met the required quality and purity specifications. This was followed up by some deft lobbying by the director of the Indian Institute of Science, C.N.R. Rao (awarded the Padma Vibhushan on Republic Day) and by A.R.Vasudeva Murthy, who headed the research team at the Institute. The Government's department of non-conventional energy resources, which is in charge of the solar energy programme and which therefore will be the most important user of the silicon produced by the National Silicon Facility, also put in a strong word against the Hemlock collaboration. The department argued that the Hemlock technology would be outdated quickly, once a cheaper method using the amorphous silicon technology was fully developed.

The Mettur Chemicals plant: indigenous claimant

Rajiv Gandhi questioned the wisdom of investing Rs 92 crore in the project. Also, Mettur Chemicals already had a small plant that could be scaled up with a little investment.

Rajiv Gandhi himself is believed to have questioned the wisdom of investing Rs 92 crore in a project whose initial output would be worth no more than a few crores of rupees annually. Those opposed to the Hemlock deal argued that the interest on Rs 92 crore could be used to import and stockpile all the silicon that the country would need for the next few years, till the amorphous silicon technology became fully developed. Also, Mettur Chemicals already had a two-tonne pilot plant that could be scaled up to 20 tonnes with a relatively small investment of Rs 9 crore. Until the solar energy programme takes off (there is uncertainty as to when this will happen), this capacity would be large enough to meet the full domestic demand.

If all these arguments made sense, a number of heavyweights in the scientific establishment continued to push for the Hemlock collaboration. S.Varadarajan, director-general of the Council of Scientific and Industrial Research (CSIR), who headed a new team asked to study the options, was believed to be in favour of Hemlock, though when asked by INDIA TODAY he declined to comment. Also, the director of the National Chemical Laboratory (NCL) in Pune wrote to Varadarajan saying that his scientists were not in a position to deliver the goods. But insiders said that this verdict was at least partly influenced by NCL's in-house politics.

The arguments put forward by those in favour of staying with Hemlock were several: it would not be easy to stockpile imported silicon for the simple reason that its export was regulated by the US government, and most sellers were in any case fully booked; the domestic option was of dubious merit because both the Bangalore and Pune scientists had a long way to go before their work was completed; and the amorphous silicon technology would not sweep aside the Hemlock technology for a long time to come.

With the controversy threatening to become a major issue concerning the importance attached to domestic work in research and development, the several leading actors in the drama seemed to be taking entrenched positions and extreme stances. Said a well informed and impartial observer of the scene: "This has become a political issue, and the relevant questions are not being debated dispassionately. I think the final outcome will really depend on who has more influence in the Government."

Some of the prime minister's aides, meanwhile, were working on the possibility of pooling the entire national expertise in polysilicon by forming a new outfit that would then be given charge of producing not just polysilicon but also other vital raw materials required by the electronics industry. If necessary, the new team would rope in non-resident Indian experts, as had been done in the setting up of the Centre for Development of Telematics. The feasibility of the proposal was being worked out last fortnight, and unless Varadarajan was able to register his strong support for the Hemlock option, it seemed likely that the Government would ultimately go for the domestic option.

GROFED

Uphill Battle

CHALLENGES are a temptation that the intrepid milkman of Anand, Dr Verghese Kurien, just can't seem to resist. Ever since he captured the milk industry in Gujarat and brought it into the cooperative fold with the help of Operation Flood, he has been looking for new worlds to conquer. Six years ago, he thought he had found one in the mammoth edible oils industry which was—and is—under the constricting control of a group of powerful traders. "I will take on all the oil kings in Saurashtra, stop fluctuations in oil prices and ensure that groundnut farmers rule the roost," he had vowed. But that is one promise he now finds hard to keep.

Kurien's Gujarat Cooperative Oilseed Growers Federation (GCOGF), also known as Grofed, has undoubtedly made something of a beginning. It has set up massive oil milling plants in the state at Jamnagar, Junagadh, Vapi, Dissa, Bhavnagar and Jagudan—all with up-to-date equipment to give them an edge over the tired and run-down mills owned by private millowners who have so far been raking in fantastic profits. In fact the project has gone as far afield as Madhya Pradesh, where Kurien's energetic promotion of soyabean cultivation has enabled farmers to get, for the first time, a good price for their crops this year. The movement is catching on in Orissa and Andhra Pradesh as well, due to the efforts of the National Dairy Development Board (NDDB) of which Kurien is the chairman.

The new awareness among the farmers and the better prices offered by the cooperative have forced the middlemen and traders to raise their offers too. This has drastically cut into the profits of the middlemen. Mukesh Shah, a major trader of edible oils in Bhavnagar, says: "In the long run, Grofed may be able to wipe us out. They have the resources to grow." He points out a trifle bitterly: "Just one mill of the federation can afford to buy 40 trucks of groundnut a day. How many of us will be able to do that?" And Haroon Vali Mohammed, who runs a small mill says: "This business has no attraction any more. Our profits have come down from Rs 4 a tin to Re 1." It is no surprise that in the past five years, the number of oil mills functioning in Saurashtra has fallen from 1,300 to about 850.

The farmers are jubilant, though. "Till now we were forced to accept prices set by the trader. Now farmers will dictate the prices," Says Popatbhai Patel, a farmer. The idea of a cooperative is catching on surely, if slowly. Now there are over 1,100 societies of farmers who grow groundnut, and it has an impressive 93,228 members spread over 1,484 villages. The popularity and presence of Grofed are thus escalating—in 1979-80, it managed to procure 3,888 metric tonnes of groundnut, in 1983-84 the figure jumped to 1.12 lakh metric tonnes, which included groundnut, soyabean, rapeseed and mustard.

But that's not the whole picture. Grofed's plants, however sophisticated, are running below capacity because the federation is simply not geared to collect enough produce, and neither are the farmers giving them all they have. As a result, of the total 14 lakh tonnes of groundnut produced this year, Grofed managed to corner just 64,000 tonnes. If it is to effectively help farmers command their prices, Grofed would have to bag at least 20 per cent of the total produce in the market. This does not seem possible for another 10 years.

Even otherwise, Grofed has to contend with a powerful cartel: the entire Rs 500-crore groundnut oilseed business, for instance, is controlled by just 16 families. A well-oiled communication network linking key markets like Bombay and Calcutta ensures price changes simultaneously all over the country. Merchants have traditionally resorted to such tactics as flooding the market with crushed groundnut during the harvest to deflate prices, then buying up the oilseed at lower prices and completing the cycle with another spell of hoarding to create a bigger demand so that the price of oil increases. A Bhavnagar oil merchant gloats brazenly: "We have many trump cards like evasion of excise, tax and adulteration which Kurien does not have".

Indeed, adulteration threatens to be one of the biggest headaches for Grofed. In the past three years, groundnut oil has been increasingly adulterated with cheaper substitutes like palm oil, soyabean oil and castor oil. Acknowledging that "Kiran", marketed by Grofed, is the purest groundnut oil in the market, defensive millers nevertheless justify their lapses by saying that adulteration has become inevitable ever since the Government began to levy heavy taxes on them and brought them under the purview of the Essential Commodities Act.

Fortunately for Grofed, it is exempt from the Act because it is a cooperative institution. As for adulteration, NDDB's tests showed that 44 per cent of refined groundnut oil and 81.5 per cent of groundnut oil taken from the market is adulterated. However, there has been no consistent governmental support to Grofed— in Tamil Nadu, for instance, the state Government has not turned over even one oil mill to NDDB.

Kurien faces yet another problem: funds. Grofed has been able to make ends meet so far by selling soyabean and rapeseed oil gifted by the US and Canada. In the past four years, it has been able to make Rs 136 crore from such sales. But the Reagan Administration in its second term plans to slash expenditure on food aid to make up part of the $200 billion budget deficit. Though Cooperative League of US has promised to give 1.6 lakh tonnes and its Canadian counterpart has offered crude rapeseed oil worth Canadian $ 75 million (Rs 70 crore) it might not be enough. An evaluation team of the Cooperative League said another 37,000 tonnes of oil would have to be gifted if Kurien's project is to make any impact. Kurien himself acknowledges that this could be a problem. And in any case the American aid ends in another three years. But Kurien is optimistic. "By that time," he says, "we would have set up enough processing facilities on our own."

However, what Kurien has going for him is the increasing popularity of the cooperative movement. "More and more of us will join the cooperative as it is the only way to keep traders and millers out," says Kalyan Patel, a groundnut farmer. This has directly affected millowners. Says Chandrakant Panjwani, owner of the Shri Rajeshwari Oil Mills in Bhavnagar: "My turnover has come down from Rs 1 crore to Rs 25 lakh. All of us in this business will have to think of diversifying."

Kurien's own aims for Grofed are modest. "If we can just stop our import bill from rising and succeed in levelling our imports, it will be a major achievement," he says. Realism of this kind and the do-or-die spirit at Anand, the nerve-centre of NDDB and Grofed activity, are the real strengths. But even then, Kurien will find the road to success uphill all the way.

BSEB

Power Politics

The closed Karbigahiya plant

SIX MEGAWATTS of power is not very much to make a noise about, and the closure of a plant which supplies that would not normally hit the headlines. But when the small Karbigahiya plant in Patna shut down last October, it triggered shock waves that ended up shaking the state's entire power establishment. Last fortnight, the influential Minister of State for Power at the Centre, Arun Nehru, stepped into the act following a series of representations from workers and engineers of the Bihar State Electricity Board (BSEB), and the state Government was forced to revamp the BSEB ousting well-entrenched and powerful officials. But the reshuffle notification itself was held in abeyance for a week, during which the old board hurriedly held a closed door session to order the transfer of no fewer than 150 engineers. At least 65 of them belonged to one particular caste.

While this series of events hit the headlines in the local press, with allegations being made about caste-based politics coming to the fore, the state government was also forced to order a major review of the state's power performance, resulting in the revelation that the BSEB had generated only 1,964 million units of electricity between April and December, against the target of 2,964 million units.

Much of the action revolved around the controversial personage of D.P. Singh, who was not only the most powerful member of the BSEB holding charge of the crucial portfolios of distribution, purchase and rural electrification among others, but also a close relative of Chief Minister Chandrashekhar Singh. Singh had been made a member of the board superseding four chief engineers, essentially because he had the open support of the powerful Rajput lobby in the state's caste-based politics. And in the face-off that resulted in the BSEB, its Chairman N.Nagmani had gone on leave in disgust. This resulted in Abhimanu Singh, an IAS officer, holding dual charge as power commissioner and as chairman. Singh, meanwhile had become the de facto chairman, and he was given extensions after he reached his normal retirement age last April.

Matters came to a head with the unexpected closure of the Karbigahiya plant last October. Although the plant itself is tiny, it was crucial because it supplied electricity to local hospitals, the Patna airport and railway station, to All India Radio and other key facilities. Enquiries after the closure showed that the plant had been continued in operation despite maintenance being overdue. Contracts for maintenance work had been held up by Singh despite three tenders being floated. And although the BSEB chairman was warned that the plant might have to be shut down, endangering critical organisations in the city, no action was taken. A post-mortem report said "the closure of the plant is a result of undue interference".

That was the last nail in Singh's coffin. Various memoranda concerning his activities had started reaching Delhi, which finally stepped into the act to order a reshuffle of the board.

The review of the board's functioning that has since been ordered has shown that, apart from power generation being well below the target, several power projects in the state are years behind schedule, that large quantities of wires have been stolen, and that a number of transformers have been burnt out. Faced with the inevitable public outcry, the state Government has responded with quick announcements about locating a super-thermal power station as well as an atomic power plant in the state. But there is little doubt that, despite Singh's ouster and the review of the BSEB's functioning that has been ordered, power politics will continue to periodically raise its ugly head in the state.

SYNTHETIC FIBRES

Wearing Thin

THE PRE-BUDGET season is a time for petitions to the decision-makers in Delhi, and few have been more assiduous this time than the synthetic fibre boys. Showering everybody with petitions, warnings and advice, the nylon fibre industry in particular has raised the spectre of a number of companies going under unless the Government takes quick, corrective steps.

That a problem exists cannot be denied. Hemmed in on one side by high duties on both imported raw materials and the finished goods, and squeezed on the other by a liberal policy that allows unrestricted imports of the fibre, industry spokesmen say that companies are losing money—and because of lopsided government policy. The profits of Nirlon Synthetic Fibres and Chemicals, which produces nearly a sixth of the country's nylon filament yarn, have dipped from Rs 25.4 crore in 1982-83 to Rs 10.9 crore in 1983-84, despite sales climbing from Rs 132 crore to Rs 147 crore in the same period.

It can be argued that the earlier profit level was too high in relation to sales, and that greater competition through imports was necessary. But most companies are now incurring cash losses on their sales, with the prices of both nylon filament yarn and nylon tyre cord falling short of the break-even point by Rs 10 per kg. There is a demand recession, inventories have trebled in the last two years, and there is increasing competition from polyester yarn. Complains P.N. Maitra, secretary-general of the Association of Synthetic Fibre Industry: "Most of the plants are very old and working with labour-intensive, conventional machinery, and uneconomic capacities. It is neither possible to pass the increased burden on to the consumer, nor to absorb it."

Pointing all this out, the industry has asked for concessions from the government. These are:

► Reduction in the customs duty on caprolactum, the basic raw material, from 90 per cent to 25 per cent, the decanalising of imports and the abolition of the excise duty of 15.75 per cent on domestic production.

► Nylon filament yarn should be taken off the open general licence (OGL) for imports, which should be canalised and the customs duty raised sharply.

► The duty differential between nylon and polyester should be maintained at Rs 20 per kg.

► Since the industry association represents companies manufacturing both nylon and polyester yarn, it has also asked for a series of concessions for the polyester industry, including a reduction in the duty on the two basic raw materials DMT and TPA from 140 per cent to 25 per cent, and the canalisation of finished product imports (on which a higher customs duty should be charged) while domestic duties should be reduced.

"Polyester is taxed more heavily than nylon, but this talk of a war between us and them is silly".

KAPAL MEHRA
chairman, Orkay Silk Mills

"We get raw materials in erratic surges or nothing at all. So we get hungry one month and indigestion the next."

ASHOK GARWARE
vice-chairman and managing director, Garware Nylon

But these demands have opened up a fresh war front, with the nylon and polyester manufacturers squabbling over the question of preferential tax treatment for nylon. Within the association, there was a tussle over the joint charter of demands. The polyester representatives said that they were being taxed more than nylon, and that parity should be restored. The nylon boys countered that this would only result in polyester swamping nylon. However neither side is fully correct. For though polyester is taxed more than nylon, it continues to make profits unlike nylon. Market forecasts show there is room for both. As Kapal Mehra of Orkay Silk Mills argued, "Polyester is taxed more heavily than nylon, but this talk of a war between us and them is silly."

Even the list of demands sounds like the familiar industry litany. There is also little doubt that the protest over imports has little meaning. Imports of nylon filament yarn dropped from 4,464 tonnes in 1981-82 to no more than 1,800 tonnes last year, while domestic production has risen from 23,136 tonnes to 30,365 tonnes. Similarly with polyester.

However, the nylon sector is in a bit of a mess. To keep going the current production levels of nylon yarn and tyre cord, the industry needs 68,000 tonnes of caprolactum, of which 75 per cent has to be imported because the sole domestic producer, the Gujarat State Fertiliser Corporation, makes only 16,000 tonnes. But rising prices abroad and an increasingly muscular dollar have boosted the imported cost from Rs 18,000 per tonne three years ago to Rs 40,000 today. The industry argument is that this can be at least partly remedied by stopping the canalisation of imports through the State Trading Corporation(STC). Its very presence as the sole buyer has led to what one manufacturer calls "cartelisation" of the five or six sellers abroad. Its service fee of 7.5 per cent "for sending a few cables" is another cause for complaint, as is its practice of shopping on a quarterly basis. Says Ashok Garware, vice-chairman and managing director of Garware Nylons: "The industry consumes 5,000-odd tonnes of caprolactum a month. But "we get raw material in erratic surges of 10,000 tonnes or nothing at all. So we get hungry one month and indigestion the next. This also means large costly inventories." The polyester industry faces similar problems.

But while the battle in Delhi continues, the skirmishes in Bombay are no less fierce. Many of the nylon producers, for instance, have been trying to diversify into polyester, but counter-lobbying has denied them licences or permitted only very limited capacities. And the scene last fortnight of a divided industry fighting battles within its borders while at the same time trying to get a hearing in Delhi suggested that the nylon industry's case might go by default.

What's more, they'll even provide freighter services at special rates. In case you need to fly in special equipment for the conference.

Of course, their job is made easier by Air-India's worldwide network of 145 offices. And... by Delhi's super conference venues. Like the Talkatora Stadium or the Indoor Sports Complex. Ideal for large conventions ranging from 3000 to 25000. Or, the 9 new hotels in Delhi, most of which offer excellent conference facilities.

Or even the ultra-modern Shere-e-Kashmir Conference Centre at Srinagar. Which offers you a choice between two large and two small conference rooms as well as a 600 seat auditorium with simultaneous translation facilities in five languages and film projection facilities for both 16 mm and 35 mm. Plus four committee rooms, exclusive documentation and communication equipment, banquet space for 500 persons, an exhibition gallery and a press room. All attached to the superb 5-star Centaur Lake View Hotel right next to Dal Lake.

Naturally, with such services, it's no surprise that Air-India has been closely involved with the 12th International Leprosy Congress, the World Mining Congress, the 59th International Convention of World Association of Detectives Conference and many more.

Best of all, Air-India offers its conference planning services absolutely free! Now that you know, don't just rub your hands together in glee!

CONSUMER and wholesale prices recorded contradictory movements, with the former speeding up sharply and the latter dropping marginally. Money supply expansion showed signs of braking and bank credit to firms was down. The foreign trade gap has widened nominally.

All data are seasonally adjusted. Current trends are computed on the basis of the last six months' data to which a regression is fitted.

Wholesale prices dropped marginally by 0.1 per cent last fortnight mainly due to a fall in primary products and minerals.

Consumer prices speeded up in November to record a 0.7 per cent increase, more than double the trend rate of growth.

Money supply slowed down last fortnight expanding only 0.4 per cent, due to a fall in RBI credit to the Government and bank credit to firms.

Bank credit to firms was down marginally by 0.3 per cent last fortnight after several weeks of uninterrupted increase.

The gap between imports and exports widened to Rs 258 crore in October, increasing by about Rs 32 crore in a month.

Foreign exchange reserves were up 2.7 per cent last month, well above the long term trend rate of growth.

Share prices were buoyant in the first half of December, because of bullish tendencies in tea plantation and transport equipment securities.

Bullion prices declined nearly 1 per cent last fortnight in keeping with, but sharper than the long term downward trend.

THE MARKETS

Budget Doubts

WHEN the new Government took over, the stock exchanges were full of people tossing their hats in the air but they were apparently tossing them too soon. There are still some doubts about the budget timetable, whether the Government should come forward with a proper budget next month or just a vote-on-account. None of Rajiv Gandhi's ministers has spoken out so far but it is generally felt that the Government will have an 'open' approach to problems and will not be unduly bothered by ideological hangovers from the past. The Government is after all writing on a clean slate. But what it will write is anybody's guess.

Things will not be clear until the planners have decided what to do with the plan draft which the departing members of the commission have left behind. There is some talk about the crunch and fears have been expressed that the plan size may have to be cut down to make do with whatever is available. This is not as bad as it sounds. A small plan means more money with the taxpayer and therefore more money in the stock-market. But a smaller plan may also mean lower rate of growth.

Cement shares have dipped as cement prices in the open market are apparently coming down following what is said to be a momentary glut. Steel prices, on the other hand, are edging upwards on rumours that a price hike across the board is on the cards. Even textile shares have suddenly come to life following the setting up of an expert committee to look into its affairs. In the meantime, the Government has promptly raised the import duty on viscose staple fibre, which seems to have impressed the market. The next industry for closer attention may be drugs and pharmaceuticals which is perhaps the most highly controlled industry in the country. There are reports that some reliefs are on the way and investors would be well advised to add some drug companies to their portfolios.

Engineering shares also deserve a second look and there are signs that better things are on the way. Usha Martin, which makes wire ropes, has picked up 30 per cent in a couple of weeks and Peico, which is not exactly an engineering company, nearly as much. Those who are always looking for something special might have a look at companies specialising in anti-pollution equipment — Hindustan Dorr-Oliver is one of them — for the Government seems to be serious about its plan to cleanse the Ganga and the new board is going to spend something like Rs 50 crore next year. The Bhopal tragedy seems to have alerted the powers that be into looking into similar traps elsewhere, including a large number of fertiliser companies, which should make pollution a good business, even if it means capitalising on someone else's troubles.

BHOPAL TRAGEDY

Survivors' Struggle

THE DEAD may not have been so unlucky after all. Their end came horribly, it is true, choking on air that had suddenly gone vile. But at least the nightmare was brief. And then it was over. But for those who survived the poisonous methyl isocyanate (MIC) leak from the Union Carbide plant in Bhopal, release will not come so quickly.

Thousands of the seriously affected survivors have suffered such extensive lung damage that they can no longer apply themselves physically. Their vision often gets blurred, spells of dizziness overtake them and walking briskly for even a few minutes sends them gasping to their knees, their chests aching. There are women who have peculiar gynaecological problems. And there are others—particularly children—who keep reliving those awful hours over and over again: they have yet to get over the trauma of that winter night. Bhopal Correspondent SREEKANT KHANDEKAR spent several days last fortnight interviewing survivors, people who are still bewildered by the events of that night, and filed this report on their subsequent helplessness.

"I can't play for long like the other boys: I turn breathless very quickly."

ACTUALLY I'm 13, but my mother told me that I must say that I'm only 11 years old when anyone asks me," says Suresh innocently. He needn't be careful now because his mother is dead. So are his father, a construction worker, and two of his younger brothers.

"Please don't ask him about the night of the disaster. The doctor feels he is still mentally disturbed and can go into a depression quite quickly," requests S.M. Awasthi, head of the Children's Relief Centre, which has been Suresh's home for the last eight weeks.

"We found him after searching for three days," says his uncle Phagu, who is a kotwar in Bhaisa, a village in Raisen district, about 150 km away. They made a bed to bed search through the city's main medical centre, Hamidia Hospital, before locating him in the children's ward where he had been admitted.

Suresh, a dark, painfully thin—and clearly undernourished—boy who looks younger than his 11 years, is delighted to talk about the highlights of life at home as it used to be. He recalls clinging to his father during a night walk through the jungle at Bhaisa; a visit to a local fair and the thrill and fear of sitting in a Ferris wheel; animals performing extraordinary acts in a circus. But most of all, he remembers two visits to the airport at Bhopal where his father took him "to watch planes vanishing into the sky", he says with wonder.

"My mother used to beat me for no reason," he says, but draws some satisfaction from the fact that his father used to beat her in turn. He hated the fact that his father used to sweat so much for so little income, that their shanty was small and leaked in the rains.

He turns silent and then points to a poster of unidentified dead peeling on a nearby wall: "My younger brother's photograph is there." Suddenly, he undergoes an abrupt change of mood, and his voice starts quivering: "I miss them all so much. But where can I go?" It is a difficult question to answer for Suresh as well as for Awasthi and Phagu. His uncle is making repeated trips to Bhopal, wondering if he will be better off at Bhaisa, but Awasthi and his superiors are not sure if Phagu can be entirely trusted: after all, Rs 40,000 will be deposited as ex-gratia relief from the state Government—Rs 10,000 for each dead—in Suresh's name. The little orphan is torn between staying at the centre, with other little boys, and going to Bhaisa.

Another source of worry is his health: "I can't play for long like the other boys: I turn breathless very quickly," he says matter-of-factly. What he does not know is that an X-ray has shown patches on his lungs, where MIC has burnt the tissues. Suresh will have to learn to live with this.

■ Though there are no exact figures, the affected localities possibly have a few dozen orphans. Three of them belong to a single house in Jayaprakash Nagar, opposite the Carbide factory: Sunil, 16, Mamta, 14, and Sanjay, two years old, are the only survivors of a family of ten.

Among the dead are their father, Kashi Prasad, a carpenter, and their mother, Kusum Bai, who was seven months pregnant; their eldest sister, Pushpa, 22, five months pregnant, Santosh, 12, Kiran, seven, and Sanju, four. Sunil is still hopeful about the survival of his brother Anil, 19, who is still missing but has not been identified among the dead.

Sunil, another victim who can no longer exert himself physically, describes

SUNIL, 16
"People are looking for my elder brother in the wild hope that they will find him. But that possibility is dying out each day."

his escape quite unemotionally: the flight from home, separation from others in the melee, forcing himself into someone's van, the drive out of Bhopal, turning unconscious in a hospital in Hoshangabad, 70 km south. He was spotted there by Pushpa's husband, Visheswar Dayal, who is employed in an investment company in Lucknow. Says neighbour Narayan Das: "Sunil has been behaving so normally that I wonder if he has truly understood the enormity of his tragedy."

Dayal, Sunil says, is hunting for his elder brother Anil even now in the wild hope that if he is alive, he can take the responsibility of looking after his three younger brothers and sisters. But with every passing day, that possibility is gradually dying out. If he is not located, their future may have to lie with their young brother-in-law whose own wife and unborn child have died.

■ In a home two kilometres away, near Sarai Sikandari, in the dead of night, four-year-old Adil goes into convulsions and screams: "Pyari ben, mujhe bacha lo! Papa bacha lo!" After about 15 minutes of tossing and turning, Adil wakes up sweating to cling to his mother, Nusrat Bano Tabassum. The scene has been repeated every few nights regularly since the MIC leak. According to a Bhopal paediatrician, there are innumerable children on whose minds the horrors of the gas disaster have left a deep impression. She says that nightmares followed by bed wetting even among older children are not unusual now and she has seen at least one case of a child who is in such a state of shock that he wouldn't talk coherently even a month after the catastrophe.

Adil, who won't venture into the dark alone any more, but is perfectly normal during the day, says in a small voice: "I can see a haua (evil spirit). My friend Gabbus sees it at night too." Adil's mother Nusrat, a chatty young woman—"pyari ben" to her children—led her four young ones to safety since her husband Syed Abid Ali was away in Hyderabad, trading in chicken and eggs. She says that ever since she inhaled MIC, her menstruation cycle has been distrubed and she now gets her periods twice a month: it is a complaint common enough among her friends in the area. She says that some of them also have a white discharge from the vagina every couple of days, accompanied by pain in the joints.

■ Reports of possible brain damage to the foetus have also perturbed many pregnant women. Says Ramesh Kumar, whose wife Nirmala Kumari is four months pregnant: "We are really in a fix. We want our first baby very much but we are scared about its condition: if it has suffered damage..." his voice trails off. He describes their frustrating rounds of government hospitals and their visit to a private doctor, finally, who has suggested abortion—just to be on the safe side. The young couple is still undecided.

And that is not the end of their problems. Ramesh, who was employed with a tractor trolley body manufacturer for Rs 300 per month, has not been able to rejoin duty. The doctor's slip describes his complaints as "breathlessness, pain in chest, bodyache, burning in eyes and blurring of vision". Now he just sits out in the sun outside his home and worries. For the time being his brother supports them.

■ Not being able to return to work and earn money they sorely need is the most immediate problem among the survivors, most of whom are manual workers. Fifty-year-old Sukhram, one of the 200 coolies at Bhopal railway station, keeps lying in his tiny room most of the time.

SUKHRAM, 50
"I could carry 50 kg of luggage. But which passenger wants a coolie who can barely carry only half the weight?"

On December 3, early morning, desperately ill, he crawled into the Grand Trunk Express from Delhi, and got off at Itarsi. He lay at the station there for several hours unattended before someone helped him board the train for his home town Pipariya, some 125 km from Bhopal. He was admitted to the government hospital there for 12 days. Says Sukhram: "I have been a coolie for 30 years. And even at this age I could transport luggage weighing more than 50 kg and move easily. But which passenger wants a coolie who can barely carry only half the weight and walks like an old man?" He claims that his earnings have more than halved from the Rs 600 per month that he got earlier. He is so tired after a day's work that he can't get himself to visit a hospital. He has received no financial assistance from the state Government, and does not get the free ration being distributed because he has no ration card. "I'm just very tired now," he says hopelessly.

■ Among the poor, it is quite common to be careless about health, but this indifference may well prove fatal now. "No, no, no, you're not taking me to hospital," insists Mebabai hysterically half laughing and half sobbing: "Ghosts of the dead still roam free!" "She has gone slightly mad," explains her brother Darshan Lal apologetically.

MEBABAI
"No, no, you're not taking me to hospital. Ghosts of the dead still roam free."

Mebabai lives in the district headquarters of Sehore, 40 km to the west, but was in Bhopal on December 2 to meet her four brothers who live near the Carbide factory in an area called Chhola Mandir. During the panic, she got separated from her brothers but didn't seem too much the worse for it the following day. On December 4, still perfectly normal she boarded a bus for Sehore. But three days later she experienced a numbness in the left hand and leg. Within a few hours it had spread and now her left side is paralysed.

Mebabai says that she has had no such problem before. She is not sure if the paralysis is the effect of MIC inhalation, particularly because of the delayed reaction. But there have been other isolated cases of nervous disorders, and in at least some of them, the effect showed only after two days or so.

Mebabai talks quite sensibly until medical treatment is mentioned. And then her weird laughter breaks out. The terror of what she underwent is yet to pass.

■ But among horrifying experiences, few can compare with that of Kalabai, in her mid-40s and a resident of Subhash Nagar on Chhola Road. She was separated from her husband Bihari Lal, a cloth mill worker, on the morning of December 3. Recalls Kalabai: "Some of us were taken in a police van to Hamidia Hospital. That is the last thing I remember before I fell unconscious." Adds Bihari: "That whole day we went through the hospital but just couldn't find her."

They couldn't have. "When I recovered consciousness," recalls Kalabai shyly, "I couldn't open my eyes because they couldn't tolerate light (a condition called photophobia). I couldn't understand where I was. I felt a weight on my back. What could it be? Was I at home? I pushed it off and blinked my eyes open to see what it was: it was a man's body. The whole room was full of bodies." She had been taken for dead in the chaos and dumped in the mortuary. Kalabai staggered out of the room and was so petrified that even when her relatives found her she wouldn't let them come near her. It took several hours before she would quieten down. Says Kalabai: "I don't think I'll ever forget it."

■ Surely among the more cheerful of the seriously hurt people is V.K. Sharma, deputy chief controller in the railways: Sharma was admitted to hospital for a full three weeks and MIC has left such a bad affect on his lungs that the doctors who saw his X-ray first thought it was tuberculosis. Sharma rejoined duty a month and a half later on January 17, but "got totally out of breath and underwent a sensation of falling", so that he has been confined to bed again. Though few people know it, Sharma also played a pivotal role in those crucial hours. He was in charge of the railway control room which monitors the movement of trains. At 2.30 a.m. himself seriously ill—the station is close to the Carbide plant—he issued orders to nearby stations that all trains approaching Bhopal be stopped until further orders: two passenger trains were due. It was a hard decision to take because there was no superior to check with before halting traffic on the important Delhi-Madras main line. At 3 a.m. Sharma fainted. Says he modestly: "I don't think it was such a great deed. It may have saved many lives but I was too far gone to think clearly. I issued orders only by instinct."

V.K. SHARMA
"I may have saved many lives, but I was too far gone to think clearly. I issued orders only by instinct."

KALABAI
"I couldn't understand where I was. I opened my eyes and discovered I was in a mortuary. I don't think I can ever forget it."

The desire to survive may have saved the lives of many during those dangerous hours. But in the future, unless purposeful assistance comes from the Government, Suresh and Sukharam, Adil and Mebabai may find that the instinct of self-preservation is not enough to carry on.

An actual large-scale integrated silicon chip is more than 100 times smaller than a stamp. It contains all the electronic information of a large circuit board with over 10,000 components, consumes less power, works much better and faster.

Rockets shoot into space. Telephone calls are made. Video games divert and entertain. And computers put miraculous processing powers in the hands of man.

At the heart of all these is something very simple, very ordinary. The miracle of the silicon chip, which sophisticated technology creates from ordinary sand, is awesome and its implications enormous.

Once coded with the electronic information, the silicon chip is much smaller, more efficient and far less expensive than conventional systems.

In India, Semiconductor Complex Ltd. makes LSI silicon chips for a variety of applications. From coder/decoder (CODEC) for telephone exchanges to calculators, from remote control systems to quartz watches and clocks, from computer terminals to data processing systems; in collaboration with three international giants in the field.

To not only update technology and bring a new efficiency to communication, but increase productivity and provide employment and a new standard of living for lakhs of Indians.

The captured Sri Lankan Navy gunboat: escalating cold war

SRI LANKA

Gunboat Diplomacy

THE CONSTANT fluctuations in the temperature of the diplomatic cold war between Colombo and New Delhi over the vexatious Tamil issue continues unabated. Rajiv Gandhi's swearing in as prime minister witnessed an immediate thaw which was quickly frozen over by the capture of a Sri Lankan naval vessel along with its seven-member crew by the Indian coastguard last fortnight. The Sri Lankan boat was taken into custody after it had fired upon Indian fishing trawlers and looted them of their catch. When the boat was overhauled, it was at least five miles inside Indian territorial waters.

Colombo lost no time in voluble expressions of outrage which were quelled somewhat when the Indian Government offered to release the boat if Colombo in turn released 17 Indian fishermen held in Sri Lanka since last October on charges of poaching. Then, last week, the sun shone once again on Indo-Sri Lankan relations when Colombo ordered the release of the fishermen and New Delhi reciprocated by handing back the captured naval vessel.

But that was clearly only a surface gain. Behind the diplomatic facade, the real war on the ground showed no signs of abating. Sri Lankan President, J.R. Jayewardene flatly stated in a Newsweek interview last fortnight that there was no question of having any further negotiations with the Tamil United Liberation Front (TULF), the most moderate of the Tamil groups battling for Eelam, or a separate state.

The other groups, meanwhile, were continuing their war with Sinhalese security forces with increased aggression. On January 9, a major crackdown by the Sri Lankan army in the Jaffna peninsula left 14 Tamil guerrillas dead and 44 others arrested. The separatists belonged to the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE). Ten days later, 22 Sri Lankan soldiers and 16 civilians died when guerrillas blew up the Colombo-bound Yaldevi train 300 kilometres north of the capital. A defence ministry spokesman candidly admitted that it was the most serious strike by Tamil activists against security forces to date. The same day, guerrillas also blew up a road and rail bridge at the approach to the northern Jaffna peninsula.

The off-shore battle also showed no signs of abating despite the capture and release of the Sri Lankan patrol boat—a direct result of the increased Indian naval and coastguard presence off the coast of Rameswaram. In Rameswaram, the rejoicing that accompanied the capture of the Sri Lankan vessel was a natural outpouring of relief after having been virtually terrorised by marauding Sri Lankan vessels. The one that was eventually captured was on one such mission. The three occupants of a fishing vessel that set off from Rameswaram that night, Antony Adamai, Dhanushkodi and Arumugam, were the targets. Dhanushkodi, recounting the unnerving experience, said: "It was around 9.30 at night and we were north of Rameswaram Island well inside Indian waters when the sky was illuminated by a flare and we saw a Sri Lankan vessel in front. We froze and before we could do anything there was a volley of machine gun fire. A bullet hit Antony in his right leg. We lay prostrate and an hour later another Sri Lankan ship appeared and coolly picked up our prawn catch, ropes and oil cans and left. We got back to shore and took Antony to the hospital."

In the wake of the incident and the subsequent capture of the Sri Lankan vessel (with 54 kg of purloined prawns), the Rameswaram fishermen are in a violent mood. The crew were whisked off to Madurai under heavy guard to prevent reprisals against them by the fishermen. Said Deputy Inspector General of Police of Madurai range, G.Veeraraghavan: "We have not arrested them. We have only given them police protection. If we had not, the Rameswaram fishermen would have attacked them."

But the tension still simmers. Very few fishermen from Rameswaram, Pamban or Mandapam have dared to venture out, a situation that has existed for over a year now. The result has been acute hardship for the 10,000 families who depend directly on fishing for their livelihood and the thousands of others who depend on it indirectly.

However, though the stories of Sri Lankan atrocities and harassment are innumerable, coastguard officials say that many fishermen ask for trouble by crossing the maritime boundary. They also say that patrolling off Rameswaram has been stepped up and more and faster patrol boats deployed.

Elsewhere, however, it was clear that the cold war between the two countries is not going to be confined to the seas. In Madras, spokesmen of the diverse guerrilla groups are desperately searching for closer unity to counter "state terrorism" in Sri Lanka. "Right now, the pressure for unity is being felt more and more," admits a spokesman for the LTTE. Even the TULF is actively canvassing for greater unity now. TULF Secretary General Appapillai Amirthalingham told INDIA TODAY last fortnight: "We are planning to bring about unity and evolve a common programme of action. There is now a general realisation among all sections that this is the most crucial juncture in the history of our people. The moves have been fuelled by the realisation that the Sri Lankan strategy is to wear out the Tamil militants and keep them on the run. Militants believe that staying power will be the most vital factor for the continuation of their war and groups that have been at each other's throats all this while are only helping the common enemy. But if some semblance of unity is achieved, that can only mean that the war of attrition will escalate, rendering the dim prospects of a political settlement of the problem even dimmer."

MOTHER TERESA

Passing on the Mantle

'I am the Alpha and the Omega,
the First and the Last,
the Beginning and the End'
Revelation 22:13

THE PRAYERS, the rosary, the obligatory silence and the loving service of Christ in the poorest of the poor: if these were the hallmarks of the Missionaries of Charity, the world-famous Catholic congregation with its headquarters in Calcutta, then nothing is really amiss. But, beyond the ring of joy in service, there is lately a deep undercurrent of anxiety: the concern is over the health of Mother Teresa, 1979 Nobel Peace Prize-winning missionary who founded the congregation 35 years ago.

At 75, her spirit is still willing to be God's "instrument of love" but the body is clearly getting weak. She is now a pale shadow of her ebullient self. The familiar stoop has got more pronounced, caused by a vertebral problem which she refuses to have medically examined; her sprinty gait is lost forever; and, as fellow-nuns confide, she runs a temperature every single morning.

In May 1983, during her meeting with Pope John Paul II in Rome, she suffered a cardiac arrest and now suffers from angina pectoris. In Rome, she was going ahead with her scheduled trip to Germany and Poland regardless, but the Pope had to intervene with the words: "Mother, obey the doctor." She took that as an order and was bed-ridden for a month in Rome, her first-ever period of rest since she heard the divine call one day in 1946. But she is out on her routine grind again. On Christmas Day, she left for Ethiopia, where a calamitous famine is raging, despite having a fever. And, last fortnight, she was off again for a hectic month-long tour of China, Hong Kong and Macao.

The inevitable question is: how much longer can she continue? And—after Mother Teresa, who? She does not answer beyond saying: "God will find another person, more humble, more devoted, more obedient to Him, and the society will go on." But, however unthinkable, the question of succession has inescapably arisen because of the frail nun's personal charisma and the world-wide attention focussed on her.

Over the years, and bit by bit, Mother Teresa has overshadowed her creation—the Missionaries of Charity. So confident is her position in the world community today that she can convey her requests directly to heads of superpowers—and they are seldom dishonoured. Last month, she sent a message for assistance directly to President Reagan from communist-ruled Ethiopia and the US President promptly despatched US $64 million though with the rider—in a personal letter to Mother—that he feared the Ethiopian regime might not distribute the aid effectively to the people. Even her trip to China was a coup of sorts: the Chinese Association of Patriotic Priests and Bishops, surfacing as late as 1978 after being pushed underground during the Cultural Revolution, sought and promptly obtained from the authorities permission to invite Mother Teresa.

The nuns loathe to show it, but they are just as much concerned as the rest of the world as to what happens to the small (2,500-strong) but extremely high-profile congregation after her. And the question has gained a frightening poignancy this year. Though guarded as one of the spiritual secrets of the society's life, the chapter general of the Missionaries of Charity is due to meet this year to elect, by secret ballot, the new superior general (or re-elect Mother Teresa) and six councillors general.

The chapter general is really the electoral college which meets once every six years according to the constitutions of the society consecrated by the Holy See. It met last in December 1979. The date of the 1985 chapter general has not been fixed yet. But the preliminary exercise—that of electing the regional delegates who will take part in the final voting—will begin this month at all the 233 foundations of the congregation. The nuns blush to admit it, but there is a distinct election tempo quietly building up in the organisation whose mission is to "quench the thirst of Jesus Christ for souls and for the love of men".

The constitution of the Missionaries of Charity says that the superior general may be elected for a second but not for a third term without the special approval of the Holy See. In the case of Mother Teresa, the Vatican has repeatedly waived the two-term regulation because she is the founder of the congregation. And Mother Teresa of course has never had to cope with a rival at the chapter general. "If she wishes to be re-elected this time round," says an insider, "the Holy See is most likely to respect her desire; but the question is, will her health permit any more arduous travelling and working."

JUST how all-consuming her passion for work is can be shown from her itinerary in 1983 and 1984: travels to Bangladesh, Tanzania, Kenya, Italy, Germany, England, the US, Latin America, Poland, Australia and Hong Kong. In India, she has visited nearly 50 of the 118 foundations last year alone. Moreover, her duties and responsibilities as superior general include representing the society officially before the ecclesiastical and civil authorities, which is really an euphemism for some vexing paper-work. Says Fr E. Le Joly, vicar of the Sacred Heart Church in Calcutta: "By the constitution of the Missionaries of Charity, the superior general is the guiding spirit and the fighting arm of the society, both rolled into one."

Mother Teresa is silent on her future plans, nor will she speak on whether she intends to seek election for a fresh term. "God's will must be fulfilled," is her terse reply. Her close aides point out that there is not the remotest possibility of someone from within the society contesting against her as superior general because of the esteem in which she is held as the congregation's helmswoman, but also because of her "excellent rapport with the present Pope". Last year, during Mother Teresa's visit to Rome, she and the Pope sang together, and, as many of the sisters recall, "the Holy Pope took personal interest in her health and well-being and her ability to continue to shepherd her flock".

Still, Mother Teresa has to offload more and more of her daily responsibility, naturally, to the second tier of leadership in the Missionaries of Charity—the six councillors general. It is from among them that the future superior general has to emerge when the septuagenarian evangelist is unable—on account of "impaired health, advanced age or any other good reason" (Article 150)—to provide the necessary leadership.

It is at the level of the councillors general that a measure of ecclesiastical rivalry is discernible. Like the superior general, the councillors too are elected by secret ballot by the chapter general which comprises the superior general, the earlier councillors, the delegates representing the regions, the regional superiors and some other functionaries. Altogether, the strength of the electoral college this time will be about 250: it was a little over 200 in 1979.

For nearly two decades since the inception of the congregation, it was regarded as a largely Calcutta outfit with predominantly Bengali Christians or members of the Anglo-Indian community being drawn into it. That was the time when Sister Agnes, the seniormost of the sisters, rose along the hierarchy, first supervising Nirmal Hriday, the home for the dying and the destitute at Kalighat in Calcutta, then looking after Shishu Bhavan, the children's home close to Mother House, finally to become Mother Teresa's right hand and the first councillor general—or the councillor to have gathered the maximum first preference votes.

But, as the congregation began opening up in the '70s, spreading itself out and opening more and more foundations (there are 233 now spread over six continents), the electoral college also acquired an international character and the quiet Bengali nun, who, according to some versions, "makes up for her lack of efficiency with her devotion and loyalty", slid down the ladder to become the fifth councillor general in 1979. Sister Agnes, however, always enjoyed a special affection from Mother Teresa because she was her student at Loreto Entally long before the congregaton had begun: the two were together from the first day of the society.

While Sister Agnes represents the old times at the Missionaries of Charity, the nun with the best credentials to lead, and the highest popularity, is the present first councillor, Sister Frederick, an Anglo-Maltese in her early 60s who taught for years in France as a missionary and speaks virtually all the European languages. Rigid, disciplined and tough as nails Sister Frederick now officiates as the society's spokesperson in Mother Teresa's absence.

Unlike most others in the society, Sister Frederick did not begin her missionary life in India but was drafted by Mother Teresa in Rome in the '60s when Mother appealed to the heads of some other Catholic congregations for personnel because she was short of nuns "who can be superiors". Sister Frederick responded to the call and did her novitiate in Calcutta, finally to become the "mistress of novices"—a post comparable to the principal of the spiritual school. She initiated the operations of the Missionaries of Charity in Latin America and functioned for several years as the superior of their foundation in Rome, in the shadow of St Peter's.

In a way, Sister Frederick represents the internationalist trend in the Missionaries of Charity, testified by the fact that in 1983-84, of the 16 new foundations opened by the congregation, only one—in Jalandhar, Punjab—was in India, while its activities reached shores as distant as Seychelles, Burundi, Rwanda, Hong Kong, the US and Australia. As the society reaches more and more outwards, the electoral college will also progressively acquire a more global outlook. And, as one of the senior sisters summed it up, "Sister Frederick is perhaps the best qualified to lead the society in changed times."

There is of course no scope for competition as it is understood in the lay context in reaching the important berths in the council, whose members are "one mind and heart with their superior general, sacrificing their own ideas for those of the Lord, and help the superior general to make more accurate and efficient decisions". Still there are others in the race—if that's the word—for evangelical supremacy, such as:

■ Sister Joseph Michael: the Goan nun educated in Calcutta who became the second councillor in the 1979 general chapter. Daughter of a tailor-father with 12 children, Sister Joseph Michael has been Mother Teresa's secretary for over a decade and is most up-to-date on all office matters, administrative subjects and Canon laws. But, as insiders remark with some insight, "she may not be best leadership material".

■ Sister Shanti and Sister Andrea: both are doctors, and, according to the number of preference votes polled by them, are third and fourth councillors respectively. Shanti is a Goan from Bombay while Andrea belongs to a German-speaking refugee family from Poland. Sister Shanti is also the present superior of Mother House whereas Sister Andrea is in charge of Prem Daan, the large home for unwed mothers and orphans on the eastern outskirts of Calcutta.

(From top left) Sisters Agnes and Frederick; and Teresa after a heart attack in Rome; the succession poser

■ Sister Damian: the round and chubby Calcutta Anglo-Indian who is the sixth (or the last) councillor. Educated by the Loreto nuns, Sister Damian made her mark with tireless work in the disputed Gaza strip. She speaks fluent Arabic and is now in charge of the foundation in Beirut.

■ Sister Gertrude: though no councillor, Sister Gertrude, who is now in Yemen, is also a doctor like Shanti and Andrea. The three nuns were sent to Calcutta Medical College together by Mother Teresa. Gertrude, however, was at the top of the class and was awarded a gold medal at the finals, which she promptly passed up for the next in line. She also speaks Arabic and began her work mostly with the leprosy patients in West Asia. Rated among the most intelligent of the lot, Sister Gertrude is a sure contender for councillorship this year.

Most parish heads in Calcutta's Catholic society agree that, despite their relative strength and shortcomings these women are all endowed with exceptional qualities as highly motivated nuns wedded to the ideal of serving Jesus Christ in the poorest of the poor. But church movements—like all movements in history—often follow a serpentine course, ingesting contemporary ideas in varying doses without necessarily compromising basic goals and ideals.

The Missionaries of Charity is far from being either the most numerous or the oldest congregation in India, its span being only 35 years while the Jesuits came to India over 400 years ago. Compared to only 2,000 sisters and 500 brothers of the Missionaries of Charity the world over, the Jesuits again can boast of well over 26,000 missionaries, many of whom are impeccably educated in the best institutions of the world. But the Missionaries of Charity has been able to carve out a very special niche in the Catholic world in such a short time because of two reasons: its opposition to all forms of elitism, and its iron discipline. In 35 years, only 20 nuns or novices have so far dropped out of the society's life of unrelenting hardship.

To a very great extent, this has been possible because of the strength and personality of its foundress. The crucial election this year will show whether Mother Teresa thinks the time has come to lighten her load, and, if so, whether the next generation of the society's functionaries can pick up the mantle from her. Either way, it involves the future of the world's most celebrated charitable organisation in the name of Jesus Christ.

SIX NATION SUMMIT

Voices from the Wilderness

CERTAIN international realities are indeed frightening. One of these is that only two powers are to decide whether the planet will continue to race towards ultimate nuclear annihilation or whether the genie is going to be leashed and humanity delivered from the threat of a long, all-freezing, lifeless nuclear winter. As far as decisions to run or halt the nuclear arms race are concerned, the two powers have reduced the rest of the world to a vast impotent wilderness. But this is not to say that voices from the wilderness do not try to reach the eyeball-to-eyeball dyad. There have been two successive sessions of the UN General Assembly on disarmament, the second in 1982, but with little or no impact on the blind runners of the nuclear arms race. There have been powerful mass movements in the United States and Western Europe for a nuclear freeze and against the deployment of medium-size American missiles in several European countries.

But the ringmasters of the nuclear arms race have remained unmoved. In May last year, heads of governments of six non-aligned countries assembled in New York at the invitation of Indira Gandhi as chairperson of the Non-aligned Movement. The countries—India, Tanzania, Mexico, Argentina, Greece and Sweden—were chosen by her not only to make the group representative of the four continents but also to raise the voices of a set of middle powers outside the two cold-warring blocs in support of nuclear disarmament. There is no evidence that the appeal issued by the six leaders of the non-aligned world, which was described in India as "stirring", had any impact on Washington and Moscow.

The six leaders met for the second time in New Delhi on January 28 and issued yet another "stirring" appeal. More voices from the wilderness of international nuclear politics. It was nice to see India's young telegenic prime minister preside over a summit of the non-aligned six. It was his debut in summit diplomacy, and it went very well—as far as it could go, which couldn't be very much. The pristine concepts enshrined in the summit's ringingly worded appeal were barely noticed in the American press and received only marginal media coverage in Western Europe. The appeal will surely be taken note of by the White House and the Kremlin. But it will hardly influence the strategic arms control and limitation talks which are now scheduled to begin between the two superpowers in March after a break of almost six years.

At the Geneva conference of 1968, the nuclear powers did promise positive movement towards nuclear arms control and disarmament. They got their desired treaty which sought to create forever a caste system amongst the nations based on nuclear weapons. Since then, the two nuclear superpowers have stockpiled thousands and thousands of nuclear warheads. These warheads can destroy the world 10 to 20 times over. Under Ronald Reagan, the United States has sought to legitimise "limited" nuclear war. Reagan's fancies have propelled him to allocate billions of dollars for research on anti-missile space weapons. The lunatic nuclear arms race is being run despite the grim warnings repeatedly given by scientists drawn from all countries and vivid portrayals of what would happen in a nuclear war shown on the major television networks all over the world.

Amongst the non-aligned six who met at the summit in New Delhi on January 28, three—India, Mexico and Argentina—are near, or rather crypto-nuclear powers. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi made it clear to a cold-warrior US senator recently that the explosion of a nuclear device by Pakistan would make it impossible for India to maintain its posture as a peaceful nuclear power. If Pakistan and India drive themselves into a nuclear arms race, the next candidates for the dubious status would be Mexico, Argentina and Brazil.

BHAWAN SINGH

The six: worthwhile effort

The leaders of the three threshold nuclear powers need a sharp and convincing build-down of the nuclear arsenals of the superpowers to be able to prevent nuclearisation of South Asia and Latin America. The voices raised from the wilderness on January 28 for rapid and decisive progress towards nuclear disarmament had therefore an edge which the superpowers can ignore only at the peril of inevitable nuclear proliferation. It may well begin in South Asia and spread to other regions of the world.

In his first term as US President, Reagan appeared to have reconciled himself to proliferation. Some American strategic writers even projected the concept of "the more nuclear nations, the merrier." However, in his second term, Reagan is believed to have developed a genuine satiety for nuclear arms and has promised his countrymen and his allies solid progress towards nuclear arms control and limitation. He is even said to have given Secretary of State George Shultz considerable freedom to sculpt an American nuclear arms control policy and design a negotiating mechanism, both of which were lacking in the first four years of his administration. However, the US President is clearly not in a mood to abandon his star wars concept. In any case, there is a very long haul ahead before the negotiations produce one or more treaties. The time is therefore more opportune than ever before for the nations in the wilderness to raise their voices for nuclear disarmament and also to back the voices with deeds. In this context, the New Delhi summit last fortnight was not entirely a waste of resource and effort.

RAYALASEEMA

Crusade for a Cause

IN THE pathetically backward Rayalaseema region of Andhra Pradesh, the people's hero is not N.T. Rama Rao, the saffron-clad crusader for Andhra self-respect. For a people who live from drought to crippling drought, self-respect is too much of a luxury—and the man who articulates their basic demands for more governmental attention to the long-neglected districts of Chittoor, Cuddapah, Anantapur and Kurnool, is the deceptively soft-spoken maverick Telugu Desam member of the dissolved state Assembly, Malla Venkata Ramana Reddy. The scholarly Ramana Reddy, 40, a former Naxalite activist and member of the ultra left-wing writers' forum, Virasam, clearly means business. He began the new year with an indefinite fast and called for a general strike throughout the region on January 22 and 23. But on the dawn of January 22, he called it all off after the chief minister sent state Cooperation Minister Karanam Ramachandra Rao to assure him that the Government would sincerely study his demands. Even if after the regional leader's gruelling eight-day tour aboard a grey matador, named the "Rayalaseema Vimochana Ratham" —in an ironic echo of NTR's Chaitanya Ratham—seemed anticlimactic, a point had been made.

The popularity of his agitation had worried leaders of the Telugu Desam who were in a quandary about how to deal with this obvious breach of party discipline. But untactful moves could cost the party dearly in the January 28 by-elections to the Rajampet —which covers parts of Cuddapah and Chittoor—and Srikakulam constituencies. The polls are crucial because only if the Telugu Desam wins both seats can it bring its strength in the Lok Sabha up to 30 and thus qualify for official recognition as a separate parliamentary group—making it the only party after the Congress(I) to deserve this status. Accusing the Congress(I) of fomenting trouble, Chief Minister NTR said: "It is unfortunate that our own MLA's have begun this type of agitation and are cooperating with those who want to create regional feelings."

"We have enough of our own work with the assembly elections round the corner," retorted Y.S. Rajasekhar Reddy, who comes from Cuddapah district as does Ramana Reddy. But he adds: "Ramana Reddy has taken up a good issue and the democratic manner in which he is focussing on the problems of this backward region should be welcomed." N. Bhaskara Rao's breakaway Democratic Telugu Desam supports the agitation and Ramana Reddy has found enthusiastic followers amongst both government employees and students, as well, who have successfully organised bandhs. Nevertheless, there is a move within the party to expel the activist, but such hints have only hardened Ramana Reddy's stand: "The cry must be shrill if it is to be heard all over the state. This is a struggle for the mere existence of the Rayalaseema people."

Ramana Reddy fasting atop his "Ratham": legitimate demands

Map by B.K. SHARMA

The four districts of Rayalaseema comprise 69,299 sq km of land with a population of 102.1 lakhs. But they have received a disproportionately small share of the development cake, and Ramana Reddy hopes to reverse the situation drastically over the next few years. His six-point charter of demands:

- allocation of 350 billion cu ft of Krishna waters out of the total 800 billion cu ft awarded to the state by the Bachchawat tribunal;
- spending half the state budget over the next ten years for the development of Rayalaseema's four districts;
- reservation of two out of every five government jobs for the people of the region;
- scrapping the corpus fund rule for starting schools and colleges;
- installation of a 250 mw thermal power station at Muddanur to improve power supply; and
- the construction of a statutory Rayalaseema Development Authority.

Though at least half these demands seemed unattainable, NTR responded with a five-page explanation of what his government was doing for the region. He outlined measures to provide water to irrigate an additional 1.28 lakh hectares in Rayalaseema through the ambitious Rs 687-crore Telugu Ganga project. On the demand for increased spending up to half the state's budget, NTR pointed out that Rs 10 crore had been sanctioned to tap available groundwater and store the run-off during the occasional rains. He also pointed out that more funds were being made available during the Seventh Five-Year Plan.

On the question of jobs, he said the one-man V. Sunderesan Commission was looking into the implementation of a 1[illegible] accord which provides for a sharing of government jobs in the ratio of 42:36:[illegible] between the Andhra, Telengana and Rayalaseema regions. The chief minister agreed to waive the corpus fund rule [illegible] starting new educational institutions, and called for a feasibility report on the thermal power project. But he ruled out a separate regional development authority on the plea that planning had already been decentralised with the introduction of district-level planning.

The Rayalaseema leader was not impressed. "This is a repeat performance of what NTR told me when he asked me to meet him after I began the fast," he said. Indeed, a week after Ramana Reddy had begun his fast at Prodattur, the headquarters of his Cuddapah constituency, NTR summoned him to Hyderabad and assured him of fair treatment to every region of the state. But Ramana Reddy insisted on a written assurance, which the chief minister refused. Ironically enough, NTR himself had whipped up the sentiments of the people of Rayalaseema during his election campaigns before the historic 1983 assembly elections which swept a non-Congress(I) party to power in the state for the first time. He had then taken great pains to remind them that the Congress(I) government had decided to give water to Madras in 1976 while the people of Rayalaseema did not have enough water to slake their thirst.

THE PROBLEMS of the people of Rayalaseema are very real. Anantapur, for instance, is the driest district in the country, next only to Jaisalmer in Rajasthan. Irrigation is certainly a major problem, and Rayalaseema's share of it is pathetically small. Irrigation covers 56 per cent of the cropped area in coastal Andhra, 31 per cent in Telengana, but a mere 4 per cent of Rayalaseema. Calling it a "distorted" picture of development, an engineer explains that of the 2,920 billion cu ft of water available to the state, this region gets only 257 billion cu ft. The Telugu Ganga and Srisailam right canal projects will give the region an additional 50 million cu ft, which is hardly adequate. Says the engineer: "Even if that is taken into account, it will hardly make up 10 per cent of the total water resources which is far less than the 24 per cent Rayalaseema deserves on the basis of a comparative analysis of the cropped area in the three regions."

A perspective plan for drought relief in the region showed that only 26 per cent of the sown area of Rayalaseema could be irrigated even if the entire water potential there were tapped. Three-fourths of the area would have to depend on monsoons and chance rains. And rains are very uncertain here because Rayalaseema is too far from the east coast to attract the north-east monsoon, and the high ranges of the ghats in the west cut off the south-west monsoon too effectively. Thus farming is something of a gamble. "When we sow groundnut, we are uncertain whether we will be able to get enough to eat and keep for the next year's sowing," says Anjanappa, a farmer in Kambadur. "If we get something more to sell, it is God's mercy."

All these factors have contributed to an alarming situation: "The desert is edging forward in Rayalaseema," warns K. Ananthacharyulu, retired government economist and president of the Rayalaseema Employees Association. He points out that the area under farming is dropping dangerously with the net sown area down from 75 lakh acres in 1953-54 to 64 lakh acres in 1982-83. Thus depending on agriculture could be suicidal for Rayalaseema. "The economic strategy for development may be reduced to one of survival unless industrialisation is planned in a big way," cautions a senior bureaucrat.

In fact, an official of the state planning department suggests that farm labour could be dispersed in other industries including dairying, because the returns from farming are likely to be poor for at least another 10-15 years. But Ramana Reddy argues that this wouldn't solve the problem at all. "There are at least 12 lakh farm workers and another eight lakh persons on the waiting lists of employment exchanges," he says. "More ways should be found to irrigate the land and more water brought to the drylands."

Evidently, the Government at least is keen on industrialising the region. Last fortnight, the Andhra Pradesh Industrial Development Corporation announced a massive plan for starting industries in Kurnool district. Letters of intent were issued to 11 units with a total investment of Rs 86 crore to manufacture cement, caustic soda, paper, industrial hard oil and other goods. At present, though, the only major government-owned unit in Rayalaseema is the Cement Corporation of India's factory at Yerraguntla.

Reddy calling off his fast on the very same day for which the general strike was called did serve to avert some embarrassment for the party and the Government. But Ramana Reddy is a rallying point, and a symbol of the restlessness of the people of Rayalaseema and their dissatisfaction with the way they have been treated so far. This is despite the fact that the state's first two chief ministers Neelam Sanjiva Reddy and Damodaram Sanjivayya were both from Rayalaseema. They, however, did little for their people. This is because the other regions in the state have a far greater representation in the state legislature.

All this could be changing now. As a Rayalaseema bureaucrat remarked: "We are regarded as people with big hearts and small brains—essentially emotional, and highly volatile on issues concerning us." Unless NTR's promises prove more substantial than before, Andhra Pradesh might again be treated to a display of the volatile Rayalaseema spirit.

DOORDARSHAN

The Sitcom Success

IS MAJLI still going to be languishing in jail? And is Lallu definitely getting married? At cocktail parties and dinner tables all across the country, such questions are being debated and discussed with as much animation as the current juicy spy scandal. Thrice a week, at prime time, viewers huddle round television sets to find out the answers in Hum Log, the melodramatic and slightly morbid soap opera that has captivated an ever-growing audience since it was first aired last July.

Hum Log, however, is also a symbol of the entertainment boom that has swept away the cobwebs from Doordarshan programming, heralding the arrival of sponsored indigenous television serials. Boom is literally the right word. The initially popular foreign serials like Lucy, Diff'rent Strokes and Star Trek are being rudely elbowed out by a host of locally-produced serials that are appearing on Indian television screens with metronomic regularity.

After the July debut of Hum Log came September and the launch of Yeh Jo Hai Zindagi, a light, slick comedy which has garnered a large slice of the audience in remarkably quick time. October saw Mashoor Mahal, the Indian equivalent of Double or Quits which had audiences puzzling over questions like the composer of the national anthem or Harindranath Chattopadhyaya's most famous song. December ushered in Basu Bhattacharya's Anveshan, offering an insight into rural India through the eyes of a young boy and girl on a motorbike.

The entertainment avalanche, says Doordarshan Deputy Director-General Shiv Sharma, is deliberate. "People need good clean fun so we are putting a lot of stress on pure entertainment." With that has also arrived a breed quite new to Indian shores—the television star. Lallu and Majli, the two characters from Hum Log were virtual unknowns who have now become household words. Mashoor Mahal is deluged by an average of 5,000 letters a week and cartoonist Mario Miranda was stopped by scores of people on the street after appearing as a guest on one of its shows.

The enthusiastic audience response has prompted others to get into the act. Says Manjul Sinha, one of the directors of Yeh Jo Hai Zindagi: "Six months ago, nobody was willing to take the plunge, now everybody wants to jump on the bandwagon." Already, dozens of similar productions are in the pipeline, and, with advertising agencies and the film industry feeling the recession pinch, both professions are making a beeline for the small screen with unconcealed glee. "You can't close your eyes to advancement. It's better to get a piece of the action which is what we've done," says Ravi Chopra, son of film director B.R.Chopra who has just launched production of a sitcom series starring Asrani and Paintal as two amiable bumblers. His firm, B.R.Ads has three other serials on the drawing-boards.

Not far behind is director Sai Paranjpye who is busy filming Ados Pados, a comedy series starring Amol Palekar as a divorcee struggling to bring up his young son and another soap opera titled Love Story which will feature her daughter Winnie Paranjpye Joglekar. "I've jumped on the TV bandwagon," admits Paranjpye unabashedly. And, almost inevitably, Doordarshan's own Tabassum of Phool Khilen Hain Gulshan Gulshan-fame has plans to script, direct and act in yet another sitcom, Banno Rani which, she confesses, is "an Indianised version of Lucy".

THE LIST seems endless and the cast increasingly better-known. Former Doordarshan director-general Kamleshwar has signed on Suresh Oberoi, Poonam Dhillon, Parikshit Sahni and Dipti Naval for his own comedy venture about a family guest-house run by a husband and wife team. The advertising world is hardly lagging behind in the soap opera stakes. Hindustan Thompson Associates is in the midst of filming Khandan, a big-budget serial about a self-made tycoon based on the popular American serial, Dynasty, and stars Sreeram Lagoo, Rohini Hattangady, Girish Karnad and Jalal Agha. However, one reason for the boom is also the abnormally high rates charged by Doordarshan for spot announcements on its own shows and for sponsorship of foreign programmes. The current rate works out to Rs 2,02,500 for a 60-second spot announcement on 'Super A' shows (popular prime time screenings like Chitrahaar and the Sunday movie). For sponsorship of foreign serials, the price tag is Rs 1,10,000 for a 40-second commercial while for sponsorship of indigenous programmes the bill is only Rs 35,000 for a two-minute spot announcement.

Consequently, a serial like Zindagi costs around Rs 1.5 lakh per episode which is a cheaper proposition for the sponsors Vicco Laboratories, than booking a spot announcement on Doordarshan's Sunday film where a two minute ad would cost Rs 4.05 lakh. The cost of purchase per episode for foreign programmes varies between $55 (Rs 690) and $400 (Rs 5,000) for ordinary serials and can be as high as between $10,000 (Rs 1.25 lakh) for special events like the Oscar presentations.

Though the boom is obviously in comedies and soap operas, other producers are breaking into yet uncharted territory. Actress Simi Garewal will host next month a regular half-hour programme

SERIALS

Catching On

BARELY 14 episodes old, Yeh Jo Hai Zindagi is, by Indian standards, a smash hit. Doordarshan bosses are, in fact, holding it up as an example of the kind of serials they would like to screen. "It is good, clean fun," says Doordarshan's Shiv Sharma, and TV commentator Anil Dharkar rates it "by far the best indigenous production on television." Already, it has started spawning imitations with a host of producers claiming they are making a "Zindagi-type comedy".

Shobha Doctor (above) and Manjul Sinha: contrasting styles

Till now, local-made comedies have fallen flat on the small screen as witnessed by the efforts of I.S. Johar and Atma Ram. But current fears are that the success of Zindagi will usher in a surfeit of comedy serials and the show's co-director Kundan Shah warns against "assembly line productions". According to Shah, the reason for the serial's success is that when ideas start drying up, they hire new script-writing talent. The other is the meticulous attention to detail and no stinting on special effects. S.D. Oberoi, the show's producer, hung around Kishore Kumar's house for days before he managed to persuade the eccentric star to sing the catchy theme song.

The show was originally conceived by Kundan Shah and Manjul Sinha for a leading advertising company. When the firm got cold feet and backed out, adman S.D. Oberoi signed them on without even consulting his client, Vicco Laboratories. So far, 22 episodes have already been cleared and Doordarshan is reportedly quite content to let the show run for a year.

The serial has already made instant celebrities of the serial's main cast. Shafi Inamdar, who plays the absent-minded Ranjit, has received several film offers and Swroop Sampat who plays the combative wife, Renu, is the former Miss India whose attempts to make it as a movie actress have been given a new lease of life thanks to the show. Rakesh Bedi, who portrays Renu's brother, Raja, says street urchins stop him at traffic lights to yell "Raja, Raja".

In contrast, Hum Log, the soap opera jointly sponsored by Doordarshan and enterprising Bombay businesswoman Shobha Doctor's Time and Space Video Communications firm, is wallowing in troubled waters. Doordarshan had originally contracted for 200 episodes but is now demanding that the show be wound up. Doctor feels that the show is a victim of its own success with an influential lobby working to sabotage the serial. But television critics feel that Hum Log suffers from indifferent acting and painfully slow story lines. But for that the fault lies partly with Doordarshan. The serial was the brainchild of Information Secretary S.S. Gill who wanted a family planning message conveyed through a family serial. Doctor was provided with the story board and a Doordarshan script-writer and Doordarshan also maintains overall supervision and control. Still, the serial has managed to attract a faithful following but with the plethora of new serials awaiting release, Hum Log will have to try much harder if it is to retain its ratings.

Cricket star Bedi as guest on Mashoor Mahal: jackpot

Woman's World segmented into issues concerning women, a leading textile company in collaboration with two magazines, plans a news round-up and a corporate programme, and director Ramesh Sippy and writer Amit Khanna are working on a quiz show.

The deluge may be welcome for an audience starved for entertainment but, as Shiv Sharma cautions: "Frankly, we may have created a Frankenstein. Such a vast instant audience has also given us tremendous responsibility." Adds Manjul Sinha: "Television is a different ball game from films. You can't build a dream world. There has to be a greater closeness to reality." The other problem with soap operas is that sponsors are unsure when Doordarshan will cry 'enough'. Shobha Doctor, co-producer of Hum Log, was surprised to receive a letter from Doordarshan last September informing her the serial could not run endlessly. Doctor, who was originally contracted for 200 episodes, says indignantly: "If soap can't go on for three generations then what's the point." She had plans to carry on till Lallu's son grows up into a technocrat. Doordarshan's new guidelines which give approval to only 13 episodes at a time have also stymied Doctor's plans for Idhar Udhar, another serial she has in the works. The future of Mashoor Mahal is also in doubt with bureaucratic objections that it is not educational enough.

But all this means that the future of the sponsored programme boom remains an uncertain question mark. Independent Television, which produced the widely-appreciated Election Specials, is producing 18 TV dramas for various sponsors but, according to a company spokesman: "We are expecting a lot of fatalities on the way."

Secretary of Information and Broadcasting S.S.Gill says the real guidelines for selection will be quality. The clearance limit of 13 episodes, he says, is only to ensure that producers do not get complacent about quality.

Meanwhile, signs are that sponsorship of foreign serials is not being too favourably viewed by the Information and Broadcasting Ministry. Diff'rent Strokes had several sponsors in the queue after Campa Cola backed out but Doordarshan opted to take it off the box. Similarly, serials like MASH and Sesame Street suggested by sponsors have been vetoed for being too alien. Most sponsors, confused about the yardsticks, are opting for single events like the Oscar and Grammy Awards and the Nobel Prize ceremony. Though one-sixth of TV time is allotted for foreign programmes, Gill says that entertainment will have to take a back seat to education, information or shows that are stylistically superior. But the reduction of foreign serials has laid the field wide open for the Indian variety and for the moment, at least, the sponsors are merrily warbling "Yeh Jo Hai Zindagi".

BIHAR UNIVERSITY

Degrees of Fraud

IT WAS strange arithmetic that confronted Bihar University officials. Only 288 students had been admitted to the Intermediate (science) course in Langat Singh College, but 500-odd "regular" students were up for examinations. Last year there were only 32 students in the physics honours class but 96 appeared for the examinations. Even by Bihar's notorious educational standards, something was definitely fishy. Students who had never set foot in class were appearing for examinations and going on to acquire a university degree.

The lid was finally blown last fortnight on the decade-old racket when Controller of Examinations K.P. Sinha found that the name on one of three late application forms for the B.Sc. pass examination tallied with that of a student who had been expelled from the political science examination only the previous day for cheating. Enquiries revealed that the 'student' had never been on the rolls of the university. With that the university authorities quickly restrained about 60 examinees from taking their science and arts honours examinations and withheld the admit cards of a large number of pass course examinees.

But the most disquieting discovery of all was the involvement of teachers in the scandal. The Principal of Langat Singh College, S.L. Das-Verma, found his forged signature on one of the forms cleared by a senior teacher. "It seems to be a deep-rooted and widespread conspiracy and only a thorough probe can unravel it," he says, adding that about 130 fake students were detected from his college alone.

At the same time that the university authorities were coping with the fake examination forms, Vice-Chancellor L.K. Mishra received a report saying that a large number of forms had been accepted without the necessary "no-dues certificates", implying that a great many of the students either were not genuine or had no records in the college. A preliminary enquiry showed, said Mishra, that many students appearing at the examinations had forged signatures on their forms or did not have their names in the admission register at all.

Langat Singh College: breeding ills

"We are convinced that such rackets cannot thrive without the active support of teachers and clerks."

L.K. MISHRA, vice-chancellor, Bihar University

"It seems to be a deep-rooted and widespread conspiracy and only a thorough probe can unravel it."

S.L. DAS-VERMA, principal, Langat Singh College

University sources say this racket has blossomed from small beginnings into a big business run by a caucus of teachers and clerks with caste and muscle power. And Langat Singh College—which once boasted Rajendra Prasad and J.B. Kripalani as teachers—seems to be its centre. A past principal of the college had brought in many of his cronies from the Begusarai-Monghyr belt who eventually formed the "syndicate" which runs the "business".

The modus operandi is simple. Clerks supply the forms to the students. The forms are filled up with bogus roll and registration numbers and then sent for "verification". This is where the teachers play their role. The forms are "checked" and sent to the university. Since everything seemed genuine on the surface, the university then issues the necessary admit cards. In some cases, said Das-Verma, students even attended classes without being enrolled. A parallel college administration of the racketeers admitted such students and issued them fake roll numbers—for a "fee".

Vice-Chancellor Mishra, who has been struggling to create the proper academic atmosphere in the caste-ridden and criminal-infested university, told INDIA TODAY: "We have asked the pro vice-chancellor to conduct a thorough enquiry regarding the involvement of teachers and clerks as we are convinced that such rackets cannot thrive without their active support." But Mishra has his work cut out for him. Informed sources say the university's colleges and headquarters are controlled by a particular caste and some toughs who run the institution in their own fashion. "Anybody trying to break their control is just eased out," says a teacher, who also points out that in the 24 years of its existence the university has seen 13 vice-chancellors.

Police sources say three of the university hostels are under the control of toughs and known criminals. Recently when Police Superintendent Randhir Verma raided a hostel after the murder of a criminal he found a cache of arms there. Nearly half-a-dozen teachers have been assaulted on campus when they tried to check examination malpractices, and Das-Verma was mobbed in his office after he detected the latest racket.

Bihar University seems destined to be always rocked by controversy. Two years ago its reputation was tarnished due to large-scale manipulation of results. Then came a controversy about the regular appointments of teachers. As a retired professor of the university says, "The new Government at the Centre may talk about delinking degrees from jobs, but here teachers and racketeers have delinked degrees from teaching."

POLITICAL and military biographies are often justifications for actions taken and lives killed. Science biographies are a record of achievement. By and large, an autobiography is only an attempt at self-congratulation, bits and pieces of life tied together in a hurried, last ditch effort at immortality.

But the autobiography of an artist is different. And for an artist like Naipaul whose every word is delicately measured and weighed for style and content, whose every phrase and sentence is punctuated with just the right number of colons, whose simple narrative produces such profound complexities—any attempt at self-evaluation must be a painful exercise.

All art, be it painting, writing or sculpture, is a process, often a long and agonising one, stretching perhaps to a lifetime. With Naipaul it began with his choice of career: a writer. "From the earlier stories and bits of stories my father had read to me," writes the author, "I had arrived at the conviction—the conviction that is the root of so much human anguish and passion, and corrupts so many lives—that there was justice in the world. The wish to be a writer was a development of that."

Naipaul has sought, through his writing, to find his own centre. In every book he has attempted, under a thin veil of fiction, an introspection. In An Area of Darkness, the meanness of India, the squalor and filth of its people, the corruption of civilisation became expressions of Naipaul's own agony expressed through the medium of India, expression perhaps of his own lost identity, which he had hoped to find there.

In Prologue to an Autobiography, he has gone a step further. It is an assessment of all his earlier introspections. "A writer's work," he writes, "is the discovery of his subject. And a problem for me was that my life had been varied, full of upheavals and moves; I didn't know where to focus. Step by step, book by book, I eased myself into knowledge. To write was to learn. Beginning a book, I always felt I was in possession of all. At the end I was always surprised. The book before always turned out to have been written by a man with incomplete knowledge."

"Prologue" he begins, "is not an autobiography. It is an account of something less easily seized: my literary beginnings and the imaginative promptings of my many-sided back-ground." It is about the writing of Miguel Street. "Every morning when he got up Hat would sit on the bannister of his back verandah and shout across, 'What happening there, Bogart?' Bogart would turn in his bed and mumble softly, 'What happening there Hat'. Bogart, a fictional character in Naipaul's Miguel Street is a real character in Naipaul's Trinidad.

Naipaul: painful exercise

"The first sentence," writes Naipaul, "was true. The second was invention. But together—to me, the writer—they had done something extraordinary. Though they had left out everything—the setting, the historical time, the racial and social complexities of people concerned—they had suggested it all: they had created the world of the street. And together, as sentences, words, they had set up a rhythm, which dictated all that was to follow."

"Over the next few days the street grew. Its complexities didn't need to be pointed; they simply became apparent. People who had only been names in one story got dialogue in the next, then became personalities; and old personalities became more familiar. Memory provided the material."

And despite having a beginning which was dictated by inspiration, the narrative floundered and the author groped for a middle and an end. "The technique became more conscious; it was not always possible to write fast. Beginnings, and the rhythms they established didn't always come naturally; they had to be worked for. And then the material, which once seemed inexhaustible dried up."

The process of creation itself, for Naipaul, remained elusive. For every inspiration, for every beginning he had to turn to his own life. It is easy to see how, for Naipaul, fiction and biography had overlapped. As always, the incidents and personalities of his real life acted as inspiration for those he imagined. In A House for Mr Biswas a Hindu family migrates to Trinidad. The hero of the book ends up as a journalist in a local paper. The story is about a fictitious Mr Biswas, but closely resembles the life of Naipaul's father. In The Mimic Men, a fictitious Ralph Singh, exiled from the Caribbean sits in his dingy London hotel room and attempts an autobiography. How different is that from Naipaul himself sitting at his old BBC typewriter in a tiny room attempting his first book.

Finding the Centre is an incomplete autobiography, and also an incomplete book. The hundred odd pages of The Crocodiles of Yamussoukro, the second narrative that follows The Prologue to an Autobiography are out of place in a book that begins as a highly personal account of a writer's life—its misgivings and deeply felt anguish, the pain of writer's block the tentativeness of the first effort—then goes into a travelogue. Why the two are together is unclear. Naipaul offers only a clue. "I travel to discover other states of mind," he says, "and live...in a novel of my own making."

Finding the Centre may be about the process of writing, and his narratives. Naipaul may even have succeeded in admitting the reader to that process but The Crocodiles of Yamussoukro is only a record of a traveller's experience—however skilled. It seeks to admit the reader only to the process of travelling, seeing and recording alongside the author, no more and no less.

Naipaul's book, however, is only the beginning of his search—recording the beginning of his career as a writer in England and the beginnings of family life in Trinidad. The bitterness of his Indian experience needs sounder justification. The continuing anguish of a writer's life, the successes and failures of an accomplished one, will make for more valuable reading in a more complete autobiography. For that we will have to wait till Naipaul finds his centre.

"In my days, things really lasted a lifetime.

Like this solid rosewood swing that's been around ever since I can remember. Or my husband's vintage pocket watch that's still ticking away on the dot. Or the stainless steel vessels I've been using for thirty years.

I almost thought those days were gone forever.

Till the other day when I had a look at vessels made out of Salem Stainless.

Vessels that don't pit, corrode or stain. Keep their shine even after years of daily use. And strong enough to last a lifetime.

A little advice never hurts, I suppose.

Ask for Salem Stainless. For vessels as good as they used to make in the good old days."

The pre-eminent characteristic in a top-flight manager that instantly arrests our attention and makes him so very distinct from others is his supreme confidence in himself. Unflagging, unwavering despite all vicissitudes. Self-confidence is truly the priceless quality of good leadership. Would a manager who is lacking in this ever be able to inspire those who are looking up to him for guidance. No, for he is no better than an usurper who has no right to a position of trust and responsibility. On the other hand, the manager who is unflappable in his self-confidence can emerge unscathed from many a crisis. His poise, serene self-assurance and stability like a rock in the midst of troubles stand him in good stead in his effort to find a haven successfully weathering a tempest.

Toxic affluents being discharged into the Tungabhadra river

KARNATAKA

The Waters of Woe

ON THE surface everything looks placid at the Ranganathittu bird sanctuary near Mysore, in Karnataka. The still waters of the Cauvery that engulf the nine tiny islets teeming with birds, however, not only run deep, but are also poisonous. Three industries including a public sector paper mill located 15 km upstream in Belagula discharge loads of toxic industrial wastes daily, contaminating the sanctuary and its environs. These effluents not only deplete the levels of oxygen in the river, thereby endangering all aquatic life, but also render it absolutely unfit for human consumption.

The effects have been disastrous. On many days dead fish can be seen floating on their bloated silver-scaled bellies. Foresters report that the 13 varieties of bird population that frequent the sanctuary have been rapidly diminishing. At least 12 families of spoonbills have disappeared and an estimated 300 of the slenderly built egrets that flock to the islets have died so far this season. Besides, there has been a consequent decline in the number of tourists visiting the sanctuary—from 1,000 a day a few years ago to a low average of 300 during the peak season—with many of them complaining of the foul smelling river and coming down with sore throats and coughs after drinking the water. Warns S. Devaraj, forester in-charge of the sanctuary: "If nothing is done it would no more be a sanctuary for birds."

And it is not just the birds that are endangered. Farmers in surrounding areas who use the river water to irrigate their fertile lands, complain that their crop yields have been depleting. In Palahalli, a tiny hamlet on the banks of the Cauvery, Umesh Veeraswamy Mudaliar, 22, found to his dismay that his patch of cucumber had become afflicted with a mysterious disease. The leaves appeared to have been corroded by an acidic substance and Mudaliar says: "Each acre used to give me a bullock-cart full of cucumbers. But now I get only half." Mudaliar's paddy crop has also been affected and now he gets 12 to 15 quintals an acre instead of the usual 20. Another farmer, Srikantiah Bore Gowda, who has six acres of paddy, complains that his cattle refuse to drink the river water and if they do, they fall sick. He too is frequently down with fever and cough after drinking the water.

Despite the flurry of complaints, the Karnataka Board for Prevention and Control of Water Pollution continued to maintain that the pollution of the river was "well under the permissible limits". But the board's bluff was called recently, ironically enough, by another state government agency—the Karnataka Engineering Research Station (KERS) at Krishnaraja Sagara. KERS has just completed a five-year study of five major rivers in southern Karnataka for the Central Board of Irrigation and Power and in its astounding findings have put the pollution control board to shame.

When KERS monitored the level of water pollution near the bird sanctuary in the last five years it found that the water was "unsuitable for drinking, bathing and fish culture". This was noticed especially during the period spanning February-July when the level of the river was low, resulting in higher concentration of effluents.

In more technical terms, KERS that the bio-chemical oxygen demand (BOD), or the amount of oxygen absorbed by the pollutants was rising steadily over the years. In 1979 for instance, BOD was 2.9 mgm a litre, just a fraction below the permissible limit of 3 mgm. But by 1983, it had risen sharply to 5.2 mgm a litre—a level in which no aquatic life can survive.

But the pollution control board's only reaction was an angry refutation of the KERS findings not only of the Cauvery but also of the other four rivers studied. Board Chairman S.Hanumanth Rao dismissed the KERS report contemptuously, saying: "The report is totally unscientific. I give no credence to it."

But Rao was forced to revise his stand when the Belagula farmers staged a dharna in front of the three industries said to be responsible for the pollution. The Mysore Mayor, D. Sathyanarayana, who pacified them, promised to shut down water supply to the factories if the pollution control board took no action. The board's response was prompt. It sent down its member secretary to inspect these factories the following day and found their effluent treatment plants working unsatisfactorily. It launched prosecution charges against the Mandya National Paper Mills, a public sector enterprise, after it found that the "industry is discharging the effluents without any treatment into the natural valley which joins the Cauvery river".

Map by B.K. SHARMA

Neither were two private industries—Kapchem Limited and Gammon Ferchems—spared. Kapchem, a distillery, was prohibited from discharging effluents till its treatment plants became functional. Gammon Ferchem, a fertiliser manufacturer, was asked to rectify the "small imbalances" before dumping effluents into the river. The "imbalance" was that Ferchems effluents were highly acidic, with a ph of 1.5 against a permissible limit of 6.5 to 9. Kapchem, on the other hand, was discharging effluents with a BOD level of 30,000 mgm per litre as against the permissible level of 30.

But by far the worst culprit is the Mandya paper mills. Started in 1962 as a private enterprise and then taken over by the Hindustan Paper Corporation in 1973 after it ran at a loss, the mill has so far not installed a viable pollution treatment plant. Only recently, after constant nagging from the pollution control board, have they decided to invest Rs 60 lakh to set up a plant. Meanwhile, it continues to discharge 13,000 kilolitres of toxic effluents into the river daily. Works Manager R.S. Tripathi admits: "I do agree that the pollution levels are high. We are requesting the board for more time so that we can bring it down by next year."

WHILE the Belagula farmers will not allow these industries to drag their feet over pollution control anymore, about 60 km away, in the temple town of Nanjangud, on the banks of the Kabini, people are only now awakening to the hazards of water pollution. While the 1,000-odd pilgrims who come daily continue to take a "purification" dip in the Kabini before entering the Nanjundeshwara temple, KERS, which measured the BOD level, found that it went up to as high as 5 mgm per litre and concluded the water was "unsuitable for bathing and drinking". It identified the main culprits as the Sujatha Textile Mills in Nanjangud, and the town's sewage disposal system.

While the Sujatha Textile Mills denies that it is letting out any effluents into the river, D.Puttedeva, a 60-year-old shepherd who wakes up at 4 a.m to graze his sheep, accused the mill of discharging its effluents into the river at night. Other residents confirm his version and complain of irritation to the skin after they bathe in the river water.

Town Municipal President B.R. Shankar denies that there is a problem at all, but admits that his town has no underground drainage system and has plans to build one at a cost of Rs 1 crore. Meanwhile, sewage continues to be dumped untreated into the river. More forthright, the town's medical officer T.S. Jayanna says: "Pollution is a problem but how can we avoid it? People complain that the water is dirty. But when we send samples to the pollution control board they say it's okay. So what do we do about it?" He admits that there is a high incidence of skin complaints like eczema among his patients.

The pollution control board admits that untreated sewage from towns and cities is the major cause of water pollution. Of the 16 Class I cities in Karnataka, or those having a population of one lakh or more, only four have effective treatment plants. Even Bangalore is yet to get adequate treatment plants and continues to pump its toxic sewage into the nearby Vrishabhavathi river. The board estimates that 99 towns and municipalities have to set up sewage treatment plants. Only 32 can be expected to have these by the end of this decade.

About 20 km downstream from Shimoga town the river Tunga, wh meanders through lush paddy-fields, j up with the river Bhadra to form Tungabhadra. At the confluence lies sleepy hamlet of Kudli. But being sa wiched between two major rivers hardly brought any prosperity to the lagers. It has, instead, brought only m and illness. When the water dries up Tunga, the residents are forced to water from the Bhadra which, the study has shown, is highly polluted. villagers complain of developing ra fever or sore throats if they use the w Ironically, the main accused for the po tion is the government-owned Mys Paper Mills, and the Visveswaraya Iron Steel Limited, both located in the in strial town Bhadravathi.

From Kudli, the Tungabhadra w its way through Shimoga district crosses over to Dharwad where it bec at least half-a-kilometre wide near the dustrial town of Harihar where the owned Gwalior Rayons has its giant grade pulp and grasilene units. tional Centre—"for non-violent social change" sprung up in Ranebennur taluk, about 17km from Harihar in 1983. Comprising doctors, social workers and administrators, the centre has focussed on environmental problems as a result of pollution from the Harihar Polyfibres, as the units are known. Over the past year they held camps to educate villagers on the issues. The result has been a widespread awareness among the 21-odd villages located in the Tungabhadra area. In October last 300 activists gathered in front of Harihar Polyfibres in what they called a "vigil line" in silent protest. The centre has also filed a case against Harihar Polyfibres in the local magistrate's court asking for restraint on the mill from discharging effluents into the river.

VILLAGERS downstream from the industry also have much to complain about. In Hirebidri, 20 km from Harihar, fishermen complain that their catch has been dwindling with fish dying because of the pollution. In February last year, thousands of dead fish were found floating on the river. The pollution control board immediately clamped prohibitory orders on Harihar Polyfibres against discharging effluents into the river. A few days later the order was lifted.

The Fisheries Department, in a study, estimated that in Hirebidri alone, as a result of the pollution of the river over the last decade, the average loss to each fisherman annually was Rs 5,263, while in other villages it varied between Rs 172 to Rs 4,000. Says Kodajji Siddappa: "There are no more big fish in the river. We are only getting poorer." Gojappa Basappa, a shepherd, says he lost 40 sheep to diarrhoea after they drank the river water.

But Harihar Polyfibres denies that it is polluting the river. Executive president Sohilendra Jain argues that they have invested Rs 2.30 crore to set up what he claims to be the most modern treatment plant. "We are treating our effluents to the permissible limits. People must know that we are not expected to put back pure drinking water," he maintains. But Polyfibres has no explanation about how the massive fish kills occurred. Nor is the pollution control board forthcoming about the subject since they seem convinced that the Polyfibres treatment unit is working well. The KERS report, which again found the Tungabhadra downstream of Harihar Polyfibres unsuitable for aquatic life and humans, is the only spanner in the works. But as the Nanjangud shepherd, Puttegowda, says: "Who is to ask, and who will listen?"

Shiva Ka Insaaf: new dimensions of excitement

Bhutto: final reprieve

◆ By ignoring the hoary maxim that too many cooks spoil the broth, a leading Indian hotel chain has managed to achieve what was considered tres impossible. Last fortnight eight famous European chefs who would normally not be seen dead in each other's kitchens, sat down at the same table to acquaint themselves with Indian cuisine and also, in return, display their culinary abilities for the benefit of carefully selected guests. After all, what's sauce for the goose, is also sauce for the gander.

The chefs: trading secrets

◆ When the box-office refuses to budge trust the irrepressible Sippys to come up with something new. Their latest venture, Shiva Ka Insaaf, produced by Romu Sippy and directed by brother Raj, is India's answer to Superman which promises to go one better. It has been filmed in 3-dimension and audiences will be provided with special glasses to watch the film. The experience, promise the Sippys, will be wild; when Jackie Shroff—who plays Superman to Poonam Dhillon's Lois Lane—throws a punch, the entire audience will be ducking in their seats. "It's full of comic and gimmicky scenes," says Sippy, "the kids will have a whale of a time." Yes, but will the box-office?

◆ Success does have its price as the team responsible for the film Nikaah (Marriage) being a smash hit found out last fortnight. Producer-director B.R. Chopra, actors Deepak Parasher and Raj Babbar and heroine Salma Agha have been served summons to appear before a magistrate in connection with a defamation suit. The suit, filed by Imdad Saqui of Srinagar, alleges that Nikaah has defamed the Muslim way of life and culture and has deliberately misrepresented Islamic law pertaining to talaq (divorce). "This is a case of simple harassment," complained Chopra, "I feel that once a picture has been cleared by the censors no one should be entitled to file suits." Hardly the sort of stand that will stand up in court.

Agha, Babbar and Parasher in Nikaah: courting trouble

◆ Ruchika, the Delhi-based theatre group, is best known for the play they never staged—Bhutto. Two years after the Delhi police banned I.S. Johar's controversial political satire, the high court ruled in favour of the theatre group, allowing them to finally let the play—a three-act dialogue between the late Pakistan president and General Zia-ul-Haq—see the light of day. But the glad tidings have thrown up new problems for the play's director, Arun Kukreja who now has to reassemble his cast for re-rehearsals. "I wish it were a film," he says wryly, "we could have shown it immediately." Bhutto's ghost, it seems, will have to wait a while before eventually being laid.

Sharma: bargain book

■ Where there's a Wills, there's a way. Armed with that conviction, young sports journalist Lokesh Sharma approached ITC before the Los Angeles Olympics and made them an offer—a ticket to LA in exchange for a book on the Games. Last month, he finished his part of the bargain, the Wills Book of Excellence. "It was tough but great fun," Sharma says proudly. Obviously someone who believes in travel now, book later.

SENSATIONAL SCANDAL

Your cover story "The Spy Sensation" (February 15) was excellent. We can conclude from this that there is a big dent in our security system. The largest espionage, perhaps the most well-planned in recent times, had such a wide network that it surely could not have been built overnight and while it was spreading its roots our security system failed to spot them. The information given by the home minister is like a bikini which has concealed the essentials and revealed the superfluous; no information regarding who all were involved and how much damage it has done to the country has been made available. Rajiv Gandhi cannot really fulfil his promise to give the country a clean government unless he pinpoints the cause and source of this rot and takes stern steps to root out the evil. He has to take bitter decisions in order to live up to the expectations of the people who voted him to power.

Eluru C. SURYAM

■ "The Spy Sensation" was a lukewarm report on the biggest spy scandal since Independence. It did not unravel the root causes of the malaise. Notwithstanding the magnitude of this shameful episode, it is essentially a slur on the Government whose employees are selling the nation's secrets for meagre sums. The extent to which corruption has been encouraged and patronised is virtually eroding the system. We are making huge claims that we have unearthed a spy ring, but what big deal is it that considering it has been going on for such a long time and that too under the prime minister's nose. The results of past misrule are now coming to light.

New Delhi USHA SUMIT

■ The cover photograph was praiseworthy and highly symbolic: sinister black with the spotlight on a few influential persons having access to confidential files rightly conveying the inherent mood of intrigue, mystery and treachery behind the espionage operation.

MATTER FOR CONCERN

Rajiv Gandhi in his interview ("People's expectations are scary", February 15) has said that the judicial inquiry regarding the Delhi riots is not being instituted because it would be raising dead issues. Mrs Gandhi died before the riots occurred and as such her death is a "deader" issue, but an inquiry has still been instituted on her assassination and the entire election campaign was woven around this facet. Her murder rightly calls for an inquiry but so do the countless ghastly murders which occurred in the wake of her assassination. If Mr Gandhi is serious about his clean image, he should institute an inquiry on the matter immediately, and if not, let it be known that he is in any case no cleaner than any of his politician colleagues.

Jalandhar MEENAKSHI

SIGNIFICANT MOVE

Your analysis of the Anti-Defection Bill ("Taming the Turncoats", February 15) was illuminating. The passing of the act is no doubt a momentous decision and is imbued with the laudable purpose of cleansing the dirt from Indian politics. But the act puports to only cure the symptoms and not the disease itself. The malaise of Indian politics is its lack of principle and unless its ideological base is strengthened, it will continue to be a hide-out for undesirable characters. Thus, the only good thing about the new act is that it is in the right direction.

DOWN TO EARTH

To discontinue the Hum Log serial, as stated in your story "The Sitcom Success" (February 15) could be the worst thing Doordarshan could do. The family serial may lack the wit and the filmi glamour of Yeh Jo Hai Zindagi but it is certainly in a class by itself. A visit to any rural area or for that matter to any lower middle class area will show how popular the serial is. The actors are anything but indifferent. True, some of its sequences are slow, but it is not right to condemn the entire programme on this count.

QUIET BURIAL

The cover illustration was an excellent portrayal of the Opposition in the wilderness (January 31). The pale sepia pillars reminded one of an ancient gallery of living martyrs, buried in a political upheaval which might prove to be a historical relic some day.

Secunderabad — NAZNEEN EDULJEE

■ The cover story on the decimated opposition at the recent hustings was revealing. The drubbing did not seem to be visible to the national press who failed to see the mood of the common voter. What has emerged from this defeat is the indication that we are now sick of octogenarian leadership and that such leaders should step down voluntarily.

Panipat — YASH K. MANGAL

■ You should not have included N.T. Rama Rao in your cover illustration, bracketing him with Chandra Shekhar, Charan Singh, Vajpayee and others. He has proved his mettle better than any other leader of the so-called national opposition parties.

Madras — A. SESHAGIRI RAO

■ "In the Wilderness" is a poignant story of opposition dilemma. They have not been able to overcome the shock of a near total wipe-out. The fact is that the Congress(I) has identified itself with the masses and the people are ready to vote for Rajiv for being Indira Gandhi's son and for symbolising new hope, change and dynamism, without making promises. How would it matter if the opposition parties bring about a change in their attitudes, policies and programmes? At present, the greatest service the opposition stalwarts can render to the country is by renouncing politics and forgetting about their desire to serve the people. Let awareness of the need for change spontaneously dawn on the people, and there will be change.

New Delhi — GOPAL TRIPATHI

MOVING ON

Your special report "Rajiv Gets Going", (January 31) provided a very clear picture of the new prime minister's dynamic rise. At the same time you have not hesitated in expressing doubts as to whether he will finally be able to deliver the goods. There are bound to be others like you. Looking at the swift electronic action of his "broom", I am sure people will soon realise their mistakes. The way Rajiv has started tackling important issues immediately after taking over can be seen as a positive sign and one hopes that we will shortly have a clean administration that works.

Noida — J.R. LAROIYA

■ Your report speaks of new brooms sweeping clean. But sweeping the dust off one place and pushing it into the other would not help in producing the desired results. The reshuffles in the bureaucracy lead only to short-term hubbubs, but once the newcomer gets used to his surroundings he settles down impassively. New governments may come and go but as long as the national character does not develop and integrity and sincerity become a part of life, we cannot hope to achieve anything.

Jaipur — ASHIMA VARSHNEY

APPALLING RITUAL

It is appalling to note that despite the all round progress, there are pockets in the country where superstitions are still widely prevalent ("Scars of Suffering", January 31). The arrest of one person here or there is absolutely no solution as branding seems to have overwhelming social sanction. That even educated people should have faith in its efficacy goes to prove that possessing a college degree is no panacea to social problems—or any problem for that matter—unless our so-called system of education teaches one to question such beliefs. The solution lies in educative propaganda against the ill-effects of branding and developing medical facilities in the area; penal action may not help since quacks indulging in such activities do so not merely for personal material gains but in response to the social demands.

New Delhi — SURENDRA S. YADAV

■ Branding is the most common line of treatment especially for various ailments of children—to the extent that if a survey of the local rural population were to be conducted the scars of branding could serve as marks of identification for at least 70 per cent of them. In spite of the fact that branding is a criminal offence it still continues and has social sanction. This barbarous practice should be abandoned immediately, but till then it should be made a rule that the person accompanying the child for branding should also be branded so as to make him or her realise the agony of the heinous act.

The heart has started beating again

Cardiac Equipment from BPL. For diagnosis, monitoring and resuscitation.

When a dysfunction in the heart occurs, the Defibrillator is used, as a last resort, to discharge a measured amount of electrical energy into the patient's heart to restore its natural rhythm. The monitor displays the ECG continuously and the recorder makes a copy of the wave forms.

The Defibrillator, now a byword in the medical profession, is just one example where BPL has used electronics for life saving applications. Electro-cardiographs and Patient Monitoring Systems complete the range.

There are other vital areas that BPL serves too. With Computers, Communications, Components, Instrumentation (Industrial & Measurement), Office Automation and Consumer Electronics.

Behind this diverse product range is a vast corpus of knowledge that BPL has acquired over the last two decades. This knowledge has been integrated through technical tie-ups with international brand leaders like Fukuda, Japan; Siemens, West Germany and Nihon Kohden, Japan. And through an infrastructure that's unique only to BPL: Seven integrated factories, three R & D groups, in-house manufacture of critical components, a nationwide marketing network and an independent company exclusively employed for servicing. The result? Products that are better suited for local conditions. And user needs.

Yes. Satisfying user needs is, ultimately, the only objective BPL has.

Defining Accountability

THERE'S a railway accident in Bombay, and the minister sends the two seniormost officials in the Railway Board in New Delhi packing. A prime minister is assassinated, and the intelligence chief resigns while a police official in charge of Mrs Gandhi's security is suspended. A spy ring is unearthed, and three officials whose personal staff were involved are made to suffer in various ways. And on a different plane, when an industrial disaster causes 2,500 deaths in Bhopal, the chairman and managing director of the company as well as the chairman of the parent American firm are arrested.

These and other events of the last few months have raised the question of public accountability with a new urgency and sharpness, and the conclusion is inescapable that accountability has not been interpreted properly. Why should the railway minister decide that he is less accountable for a railway accident than two of his officials in Delhi (in this case, fortunately, better sense prevailed and the officials were recalled)? Why should the intelligence chief be more accountable for Mrs Gandhi's assassination than the home minister? And why should senior officials be more accountable for the after-hours actions of their personal staff than the counter-intelligence outfit that is supposed to vet their bona fides? Finally, what was the point in arresting the chairman of Union Carbide Corporation of the US and then releasing him later the same day? There is an abundant arbitrariness here that needs to be examined closely, and the principle of accountability needs to be clearly defined so that responsibility rests where it should.

There are only three cases easily recallable of ministers taking the rap for events. The first was when V.K. Krishna Menon was transferred from defence minister to minister for defence production following the Chinese debacle. The second was when Lal Bahadur Shastri resigned as railway minister after a rail accident. And the third was more recently, when Vishwanath Pratap Singh resigned as chief minister of Uttar Pradesh following a dacoity carnage. Following from these precedents, should Narasimha Rao have resigned as home minister after Mrs Gandhi's assassination, and should Arjun Singh have resigned as chief minister of Madhya Pradesh because of what happened in Bhopal. Also, should some of those who have got the rap been declared free of blemish?

One conclusion can be reached quickly. The old (but largely ignored) tradition of ministers resigning automatically after a major railway accident or other tragedy needs to be re-examined. Governmental functioning today is far more complex than in the past, and a ministerial resignation following an event over which he had no control and which he did not cause through wrong decisions serves little purpose. A minister or official should be asked to leave or be punished in some other way only if some direct culpability or neglect is established. A case in point would be if a minister ordered a cutback on investments in replacing over-aged railway track, which then gave way causing a train accident. Another would be if officials warned that the location of a chemical plant was unsafe from the point of view of the local population, and the minister overruled him. And a third would be the case of an official who had ignored secrecy procedures, thereby enabling his underlings to leak out confidential information. The only exception that should be made to this doctrine of direct culpability would be in the event of a major catastrophe, where overall responsibility must be accepted by the person at the top. And a home minister's resignation would on this count be called for if the prime minister is assassinated.

Judged by this yardstick, many of the decisions on accountability in recent months fall short of making sense. For instance, why should an upright and intelligent officer like J.S. Baijal be reverted from the Finance Ministry to his parent service cadre in Orissa because of the actions of an underling whom he did not choose but inherited, and who had served other officers in the past and who therefore escape penal action only because of fortuitous timing? And should P.C. Alexander have been held more accountable for the spies in his office than the Intelligence Bureau which had the responsibility of clearing Alexander's staff from the security angle?

The plight of those who have taken the rap must also be considered in the context of the ripple effects it can cause in the civil service. If promising or distinguished careers can come to an ignoble end because of mischance, or because the secrecy procedures are so archaic and impracticable that they must necessarily be ignored, the reports of worry and concern among government officials are entirely understandable. No official can function with the Damocles sword of uncertainty hanging over his head. A government that professes concern for public accountability must be clear in its mind as to what it is trying to do, ensure that there is no miscarriage of justice, and be careful lest hasty steps taken rebound in unexpected ways. The country must be grateful for a government that is responsive to the need for accountability and cleanliness in public life, but good intentions are not ends in themselves. They must find expression in justifiable action that is grounded in a clearly defined framework of principles.

Earn A West German Advanced Management Diploma

Baroda Productivity Council offers an easy-paced but potent correspondence course for people who are impatient about their success. The EKS-based course will help you to stop struggling and start growing, dramatically.

Course Director: Prof. Jorg Luttgau, Mewes System, Frankfurt, West Germany

Hard work alone is not enough

EKS, Energo-Cybernetic Strategy, is a proven, practical growth and success strategy devised by West German consultant Wolfgang Mewes (EKS is the abbreviation of the German term). Early in his career, Mewes became fascinated with the reasons behind successes and failures, fascinated enough to minutely analyse thousands of cases. EKS is the devastatingly simple strategy for corporate and self development which evolved from this analysis. Based on natural laws and common sense, it is not just yet another new-fangled management theory; for the thinking person it is a way of life, with success as a casual by-product.

There is a pattern in the things you already know.

EKS helps you to build on the strength of that pattern.

EKS recognises that organisations and individuals are under a natural, evolutionary tendency to unfold and further develop. Several problems may block this evolutionary tendency. Among these, or may be elsewhere, is one key problem-the bottleneck. When this bottleneck is overcome, further development continues automatically, naturally. EKS suggests that it is wrong to dissipate your energies by attacking several problems simultaneously. It is better to concentrate on the bottleneck, the removal of which triggers a chain-reaction which automatically solves hundreds of other problems. Dramatic success results not from your own force but from the tremendous latent forces in the environment which you unleash by removing the bottleneck. The effort or energy required is minimum because it is concentrated on the most sensitive problem.

EKS lays great stress on continuous monitoring of the growth process so that one is always alert to the shifting of the bottleneck from one point to another. Those wanting to be successful must be perceptive about the dynamics of change and must learn to question their basic premises frequently.

EKS will help you to question the validity of conventional objectives. For your strategy to be successful, your objective must be in harmony with the pressing needs of your environment, of your target group, so that your environment is the first beneficiary of your success. When the environment has a stake in your growth, your growth is assured.

You succeed because your growth is natural.

THE BEST WAY TO PLAN YOUR GROWTH IS TO PERMIT IT!

Though simple, EKS is not simplistic. Like all profound concepts, it evades a compact off-the-cuff definition. To understand it a little better, you'll have to read the prospectus. After that, you may never be the same again. EKS is positively addictive!

DUTY SLEEP

■ Sleep, according to one playwright known familiarly as Bill, "knits the ravelled sleeve of care" and generally tones up a system. People in Guna, Madhya Pradesh, may not have heard of the gentleman but it is obvious, from an incident last month, that they think similarly.

Two entry tax collectors were on duty at a crossing near the town late at night. For some reason they couldn't stop themselves from dropping off, but just before the tiny elves closed down their eyelids they caught hold of a passing driver, gave him the receipt book and asked him to do their job. The driver dared not say nay ,and for some time scrawled signatures until the elves attacked him with their potions. Before succumbing, he grabbed a dhaba boy and told him to do the job.

When the revenue inspector came checking at four in the morning—when, according to Bill, "dawn in russet mantle clad" comes creeping over the hill—he found two snoring officials and one snoring driver and a small boy handing out receipts. After that, of course, there was no more talk of ravelled sleeves of care.

PHONEY BILLS

■ Malicious people have been spreading canards that the Indian phone system does not work. Incontrovertible evidence that it does, telephones or no telephones, comes from Sucheta V. Nadkarni of south Bombay.

Ms Nadkarni's telephone, number 216709, was to have been installed on February 27, 1984, and she received a beautifully written letter from Bombay Telephones telling her so. She didn't receive the phone, though three months later she received a visit from repairmen who came to check her telephone because they had received complaints that it wasn't working. Further appeals brought no phone, but a bill of Rs 710 for 102 calls.

Upon which an agitated Ms Nadkarni showered everybody with letters and the phone was finally installed on October 11, 1984. A week later 216709 was cut off, because of "non-payment" of the bill. Two months later, Ms Nadkarni was to be seen with her head in her hands shedding tears over a second bill for Rs 200. Clearly, someone else was using 216709 and Ms Nadkarni was paying for this piece of highly misplaced altruism.

PAPER PROMISE

■ Swaroop Savita Bhave was one of hundreds who in 1984 was adjudged Bachelors of Arts. The lady was understandably pleased with her achievement. What made things better for Bhave was that, having secured the highest marks in her major, Philosophy, she was entitled to the Principal L.M. Datar Satkar Samiti Gold Medal.

Unfortunately, there is a silver lining to all this. The gold medal will not be a gold medal. As the university registrar explained to the graduate: "In view of the prevailing high cost of gold and labour charges it is not possible for the university to get the medal struck in gold within the stipulated value of the medal." Instead, Bhave will have to make do and rest content with a pure silver medal plated with gold.

The stipulated value of the medal is Rs 800, which at current rates, should buy about 4 gm of gold, not counting labour charges. There is more woe for Bhave: the registrar goes on to explain that because of the "cumbersome and lengthy procedure" of striking the medal, "the chancellor will present you a certificate in token of your having been awarded the medal". It's the old sorry story of the debasement of the gold standard.

FIGHTING MAD

■ Nothing could be more misleading than the cliche that women are the weaker sex. The Amazons of South America should be enough to dispel that illusion but if any doubts linger, the Aurangabad experience will sweep them away.

A drama troupe was in town with a play called Ghashiram Driver. As the title, plagiarised from another and much more famous play, suggests, the selling point of the piece was a series of 'hot' scenes between various pot-bellied Adams and fleshy Eves. About halfway into the programme, with the audience hushed into expectant silence, a group of about 30 women belonging to the Mahila Mukti Sanghatana and the Purogami Sanghatana got up and began to raise Cain. They shouted slogans asking Ghashiram Driver to go back, and shook their fists and rolling pins.

Ultimately the 30 women inside were joined by 60 of their sistren waiting outside and the roaring nineties frightened the actors so much that they hastily put on their clothes and fled. In fact, they had to leave the town with a posse of police protecting their retreat, because the women chased them all the way home.

M.G. RAMACHANDRAN

RETURN OF THE

IT WAS a week of unbeatable excitement in Madras, politically, emotionally, and also histrionically, for without the flourish of drama the old movie magic might have seemed illusory, the miracle less convincing. The miracle, of course, was the triumphant return of Tamil Nadu's ailing Chief Minister M.G. Ramachandran after a three-month absence. And the magic lay in the moment when the chief minister, alert of mind, agile in spirit and physically fit confronted a tumultuous public welcome minutes after landing in his state. Banishing all speculation that he was a patched up medical chimera, the chief minister drove up the 10-foot-high ramp in his sky-blue Ambassador, bounced out of the car, waved jubilantly to the hysterical crowds and summoned through gesture his ministers to join him on stage. Dispensing with a specially-designed van (with plastic bubble and pop-up seat) intended to display him, and rendering a temporarily-installed toilet upon the ramp useless, MGR seemed to have swept clean the medical traumas of the last four months.

Except for one thing. He did not speak that first day. And when he began a series of meetings with state Governor S.L. Khurana, state ministers and party MLA's, the others quickly stopped speaking too. As suspense quickly built up over the matinee idol's true medical condition, his ability to speak and write, to take decisions, unconfirmed rumours swept the town: that he was prone to attacks of unbalanced hysteria, that he was a captive of a coterie around him, and much else.

Suggestively enough, the one person who had been at the centre of the state's political storm in MGR's three-month absence was suddenly nowhere on the scene. She had sought to be among the welcoming party at the Meenambakkam airport, but was denied access, just as she had been kept from meeting him from the moment he was hospitalised in early October. Politically mauled and emotionally beaten, she retreated temporarily to wait for a summons from the chief minister. At week's end the call had still not come, though it was said that Jayalalitha had sent a long, explanatory letter through a Congress(I) intermediary.

So was MGR still a captive of the coterie, a physically recovered but otherwise incapacitated chief minister who would be manipulated by the people who surrounded him? The answer, it first seemed, would be available on the Sunday morning swearing-in of the new government. Then came the first shock: only MGR would be sworn in on Sunday, February 10, the rest of the Cabinet would be announced two days later. Then the second shock: the swearing-in would be closed to the press, so no one would know how much the chief minister could speak or write. If that extended the suspense, the following Tuesday brought no relief, for there was still no indication of who would be appointed to which portfolio, who would be in and who out. At the time of writing, the key announcement that would tell the state's immediate political future was still under wraps, with the announcement of the new cabinet postponed yet again—to Thursday.

But the few straws in the wind told their story. For instance, on the day MGR was sworn in for a third successive term as chief minister, he proceeded to his office to sign a single file. That signature confirmed that he was not only carefully making his own investigation into the fractious party dispute, but keeping his own counsel. For he reinstated one of his oldest, most trusted officials, K. Mohandas, as director-general of police in charge of crime and intelligence. Mohandas had in the past been one of MGR's closest confidants, his eyes and ears in the state. But in MGR's absence, he had been removed to an innocuous position. By reinstating Mohandas so promptly and so pointedly, MGR sent out a firm signal that he was in command, and that all the actions and decisions taken by the Government during his absence did not necessarily have his sanction.

If that spelt a new dread in the "coterie" consisting of MGR's wife V.N. Janaki, Finance Minister and No 2 in the Cabinet V.R. Nedunchezhiyan, Information Minister R.M. Veerappan, party General Secretary P.U. Shanmugham, and the President of the All-World MGR Manram (fan clubs) Association, P. Musiriputhan, it seemed to spell some hope for Jayalalitha. Only days earlier, she had lost the support of even S. Thiruvanakarassu, the recalcitrant young minister for nutritious noon meals who had come out in protest after being divested in January of the portfolio of excise, commercial taxes and handlooms. Thiruvanakarassu protested that he wasn't sure the decision was the chief minister's, and planned a visit to New York to confirm this, but was ordered to stay put till MGR returned. When he did finally meet MGR, he emerged sounding like a man who had been cut to size and confessed: "The chief minister is fully in control of his mental powers and I am fully satisfied that he has been acting entirely on his own."

MGR's actions now showed that this was in fact the plain truth. In his meetings with Governor Khurana before his swearing-in, Khurana had deftly sized up the man, made him read out the first few words of the oath he would have to take, and then asked him to sign three times. In a manner as yet undisclosed, MGR had also communicated to Khurana that he would have his feuding party together again in two weeks. And now his actions showed that he was going about the task meticulously.

He had shown his displeasure over Jayalalitha's somewhat intemperate remarks in a series of newspaper and magazine interviews, in which she had even questioned the legality of MGR's marriage to Janaki, by allowing her to stew in her silent sweat. By reappointing Mohandas, he had shown that he did not fully approve of all the steps taken in his absence. And now the delay in forming his cabinet showed that he was going about the business of getting his party together with care. What exactly he would achieve remained unknown at the time of writing: but there was already little doubt about the fact that it was not the "coterie" that was in control, but MGR himself. The first task facing the home-coming hero had been achieved.

The next task, of getting the party together and running an efficient government, is more difficult. Clearly, the chief minister has not yet recovered fully after his kidney failure, lung collapse, paralytic stroke, diabetes problems and the kidney transplant itself. He remained constantly vulnerable to infections, to the possibility of his body rejecting his transplanted kidney, to a fresh setback to his health. And he still had to fully recover his power of speech. Dr T.K. Sreepada Rao, director of haemodialysis and associate director of the renal disease division of Brooklyn's Downstate Medical Centre who had attended on the chief minister throughout his illness and accompanied him back to Madras, confirmed that while MGR's recovery was remarkable his "speech function will take time to come back fully". Rao said it could be anywhere between two and three months before MGR could speak properly, and that he could at the moment only utter a few words and communicate his wishes through gesture, and with the aid of a Tamil-speaking speech therapist from Baltimore who is in constant attendance. And although MGR's visual and aural facilities were in perfect order, and his "ambulatory faculty" vastly improved after rigorous physiotherapy in the hospital gymnasium, it would also take time for him to write, "writing being a very fine function of the nervous system".

How debilitating would these be to a chief minister? And could a man so long in years hope to weld together a party whose leaders were clearly looking to the period after MGR? Certainly, the cracks in the party are real and cannot be papered over, except temporarily. Veerappan, MGR's foxy information minister who had once been a producer of MGR movies and whose rise in politics had been as spectacular as Jayalalitha's, was quite open about his antipathy. Some months ago he called her a "fourth rate lady" at a public meeting. Last week he told INDIA TODAY: "Seeing the way Jayalalitha was bossing over party affairs including choosing candidates for the elections, it became my moral duty to destroy her evil force." And he sniffed away any suggestion of a reconciliation between her and MGR: "If she claims to be so close to the chief minister, why did he not ask for her at Apollo Hospital? Why not now that he's alert?"

Musiriputhan echoes Veerappan's comments. A rotund grinning man given to wearing an enormous ring enamelled with MGR's face, his life has been dedicated to the twin passions of MGR and movies. He interprets almost every political development in metaphors drawn from MGR movies so that, if asked what MGR's health is like, he will refer to such and such scene in such and such MGR movie. He compares MGR's present resurrection to the climax of his 100th picture, a runaway hit called Olivilakku (1968), in which after suffering third degree burns in a fire MGR is taken as dead in hospital. Just then, an elderly widow whose life he had saved is seen bursting into song, a fervent prayer, and the cameras racing back to the hospital scene, show MGR revving to life with the eloquent whisper, "Ma".

BUT HE does not see Jayalalitha potentially in the role of "Ma". He speaks of her as a contemptible "powermonger—simply a luxury taxi". Like many party loyalists, he finds Jayalalitha's intemperate attacks on MGR's wife Janaki the most insulting. But asked to explain Jayalalitha's dramatic rise in the party after she joined it in 1982, Musiriputhan unlike the other party hardliners, however, is not at a loss for words. Unabashed, he colourfully describes it as a "democratic accident".

Personalities, and resounding personality clashes, being at the heart of the party crisis that squalidly broke out during MGR's absence, it is not surprising that Tamil Nadu's opposition leaders from the DMK gleefully make capital. Innuendoes generally abound when K. Manoharan, assistant general secretary of the DMK speaks, but on the subject of Jayalalitha versus the coterie, there is heavy trafficking in pejoratives. Evidently, when she was ruling the roost, Jayalalitha described Manoharan as a "passenger train". Manoharan today thinks she is nothing more or less than a "town bus", implying a tired, ramshackle creature badly in need of a new coat of paint. But he does not rule out the possibility of an eventual reconciliation between MGR and Jayalalitha. "The quarrel," he says, "is between them both. But he is a great cine actor. And she is a great cine actress. Both can act well, so it is difficult to predict the AIADMK's future."

Jayalalitha with Musiriputhan: old friends turned foes

Even some of the AIADMK leaders foresee a patch-up as inevitable. K. Rajaram, the party's speaker in the Legislative Assembly, says: "True, there is a quarrel, but after all it is about two factions claiming greater closeness to the chief minister. And now that the chief minister is in control, the dispute will end. He's a large-hearted man and he has rarely punished anyone severely."

Independent observers in Madras granted that MGR's first priority would be to let the hue and cry raised in his absence die down, before confronting Jayalalitha. But it was possible that he was under emotional pressure from his wife Janaki —little known in public life till her emergence by her husband's sickbed—to delay the meeting.

But all efforts at getting everyone together would have to go beyond an immediate unity exercise, and face up to the question of who will control and lead the party after MGR, who is after all past his three score and ten years. If politicians like Veerappan control the party machine, they do not have Jayalalitha's mass appeal. Veerappan is not even a member of the Assembly, being only a member of the state Legislative Council, and has never won at the hustings. In contrast, it was Jayalalitha who was the party's star campaigner during the December elections, touring a majority of the Assembly constituencies and drawing crowds that were bigger and more responsive than those at any other meeting.

She has another strength which spells incipient danger for the AIADMK hardliners: her proximity to the Congress(I) power centre in New Delhi has been interpreted as a sign of a possible alliance in a succession issue. It is a fact that the Congress(I) promoted her subtly—Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi himself met her and persuaded her to conduct the election campaign—but the ruling party shied away from any overt show of support once the elections were over. The reason was clear: the new government did not wish to soil its hands with an Andhra Pradesh-type situation that had produced disastrous results.

MGR saw her as a possible inheritor of his mantle although he never said so. But there is no other cogent explanation possible for the manner in which he ushered her into the party in the summer of 1982, quickly made her the AIADMK's propaganda secretary and then its deputy leader in Parliament after she was given a Rajya Sabha seat. Ministers at public meetings were instructed to stand up when she arrived, and it was suggested that when she occupied a platform no other party member should appear on stage. Matters reached a point that when an MLA from Madurai district last summer tried to help her on to a platform by giving her his hand, and was photographed doing so, he was summoned to MGR's Madras residence and was allegedly beatean up.

All this was in the second phase of her relationship with MGR. The first phase had started when in 1969 she starred with MGR in a blockbuster called Adimai Pen (Slave's Girl). For the next few years she was his constant companion. They acted in over two dozen films together before she was replaced by another heroine and the period of estrangement began.

Her years in the wilderness, with few acting roles and several abortive relationships, seemed to have taken a heavy emotional toll. And it was during one of her fits of acute depression and a crisis in 1979 that MGR reappeared by her side. Their relationship gradually revived and Jayalalitha's resurrection in MGR's life catapulted her into politics.

DIFFICULT though it is to explain the chemistry of public figures in private relationships, it is not hard to place MGR's special fascination for Jayalalitha among his varied and capricious liaisons and his leading ladies. As a star she was possessed of neither awesome beauty nor outstanding acting talent; but she had class: fair skinned and fluent in English, her worldly sophistication and articulate style finely counterpointed MGR's lack of background and education. Her intelligence penetrated his superstar isolation, her flashing eyes, large rolling hips and venomous barbs delivered in spitfire English evidently invigorated him out of his xenophobic cocoon. That being a Brahmin she was upcaste as well only heightened her appeal to a man who personified the anti-Brahmin struggle.

To her credit, she worked hard at streamlining the party during her days as propaganda secretary, bringing a new energy to the role but also allowing power to go to her head. Veerappan is probably right when he says that "she attempted a virtual takeover of the party", and she described herself in newspaper interviews as MGR's chosen successor. The backlash had to come, beginning with the protest resignation by S.D. Somasundaram last year and then the public squabble in MGR's absence.

So has a third stage in her relationship with MGR begun? Almost certainly yes, but how exactly this will now develop remains the big question. The initiative is entirely with MGR, and the thrice-born metaphor seemed particularly apt for him too. Not only was MGR sworn in by Khurana for his third successive term as chief minister, but the numeral three seemed to have special, almost mystical significance in his life. It indicated an escape from three major threats to his life. His admirers spoke of it as MGR's third birth. In 1967, he survived after screen villain M.R. Radha shot at him and the bullets were lodged in his throat. In 1976 he narrowly escaped disaster when he changed his mind to board a Madras-bound flight at the last minute and the plane crashed. And now he has pulled through a dragnet of serious illnesses.

But if the seemingly invincible chief minister now set about putting his party in order by carrying out a thorough inquiry into the goings on in the AIADMK, his success would become clear only with the announcement of his new cabinet. That alone would signify the path that he would choose to cut through the tangle of grasping power-seekers.

While judgement on this had to be suspended, his next task would be to refurbish his administration. MGR's record in office since 1978 has not been a distinguished one, the state has slid down the industrial ranking, government policy has lurched towards prohibition then back to open drinking and now to a hit-and-away house where everyone drinks but illegally. Other than his populist measures, like the midday meals scheme for schoolchildren (and a major plank on which the AIADMK swept the last elections), he has precious little to show for his years in office. Meanwhile, the administration has become secretive, insular and dictatorial, revolving in a largely unhealthy fashion around the remote persona of the chief minister.

In the circumstances, the slide in the state's administration since October is only relative to its performance earlier. MGR was taken ill at a stage when the mid-year assessment of finances and plan resources was due. With the chief minister ill in hospital, virtually all his ministers spent their waking hours first waiting upon him in Madras, and later monitoring his medical bulletins in Brooklyn. Had the cabinet busied itself from October with the job of issuing daily medical bulletins, and Health Minister H.V. Hande was more preoccupied with the chief minister's health than that of the public. The opening of new dispensaries and other decisions to improve public health facilities had to wait, like many other issues.

THE GOVERNMENT's finances went to pieces, and estimates are that revenue collection this year is likely to fall short by an unprecedented 30 per cent. Surprisingly, the maximum revenue loss is from the Department of Excise despite record bids given by the retail liquor vends. By January, the department had collected only 55 per cent of the Rs 150 crore due as excise duty, and an official in the department confessed that the total revenue might not exceed Rs 170 crore (against the initial estimate of Rs 203 crore).

The recovery of sales tax and transport tax is also seriously affected. Against an estimated sales tax revenue of Rs 816 crore, the actual recovery may not cross Rs 650 crore. By January-end, the kitty had received no more than Rs 400 crore.

All this, however, is rendered less than relevant in the present situation where such considerations are transcended by the spreading halo of the chief minister's political reincarnation. In the eyes of his people his status is that of a mythological hero towering among mere mortals; his recovery is perceived as belonging to the realm of the supernatural. This was substantially clear in the response to his public appearance after his return to Madras: every expectation fulfilled, the crowd, estimated anywhere between five lakh and 10 lakh, quickly turned exultant. Kalimuthu Aramugan, a former Air Force sargeant who is now commander of the state volunteer force of the AIADMK, supervising the crowds at the public reception said: "This is his third birth. Twice before he has hovered between life and death. But we believe MGR can never be vanquished." The young cheered uproariously, women with babies and poor peasants who had travelled in buses and trains from far-flung regions of the state like Coimbatore in the west and Madurai in the south wept unabashedly at the sight; and his team of ministers and MLA's were reduced to figures of blubbering emotion when greeting him.

Pattabhi, a farmer from South Arcot district who had travelled in a lorry to welcome MGR remarked: "He has completely recovered in every sense. This is like Lord Rama at his coronation." The only fact that counts in the present-day manifestation of the long and historic struggle of the Dravidian movement is MGR. He alone is the chosen leader, and the leader alone the ruling party. Beside that fact, all issues, initiatives and progress reports dwindle into insignificance.

But as Tamil Nadu's indomitable hero, MGR is embarking upon his third reign weighed down most by the perception of immortality which his people have bestowed upon him. Uncertain in health advancing in age and finally vulnerable to a human end, the glow of his present resurrection is dimmed only by the question: after MGR who? At present, the political scenario in the state may seem like an improbable ending from one of his countless films; he has emerged the indisputable victor, ready to vanquish the evil force and restore justice to his people. But in reality, his greatest task, given the constraint of time, is to choose and appoint a viable political successor in his mould.

The white lies about Networking as told by our competitors

Considering that Networking is still in its infancy, it might be cheaper and more efficient to have two or more computers working separately.

Since we didn't really consider Networking as essential, we didn't make our hardware Networkable. But that is a minor oversight, easily rectifiable.

Besides, to connect two different systems situated at two different locations, P & T lines have to be leased. And they are not easily available.

Nobody really has the expertise in India, to see a Networking operation through, from start to finish.

The whole truth about Networking as told by ourselves

Networking is the biggest breakthrough in computers. It means economy of time, effort and money. More important, it means increased efficiency of operation.

Not all computers are Networkable. However on our products, Networking is possible between the same kind of systems, i.e. 101's or 2904's, or across different systems, i.e. 101's and 2904's.

At the moment, P & T have offered a limited number of lines to be used for Networking. But in just two years from now, lines are going to be freely available. So, your Networking plans must begin today.

We are probably the only company with knowledge and expertise to initiate and complete a Networking operation successfully.

OPPOSITION LEADERS

Life After Defeat

EVERY election produces its flotsam but the electoral storm that tossed most of the opposition leaders out of the Lok Sabha now threatens to leave many of them shelterless, jobless and rudderless. Deprived of parliamentary membership, many find themselves robbed of a roof over their heads and precious little to do with which to while away the hours or make a living.

Faced with the immediate prospect of eviction from their houses, some of them are resorting to desperate measures to find a place to stay. Janata Party President Chandra Shekhar is leaving behind the daily grind of Delhi politics and moving to the pastoral setting of Bhondsi village in the Haryana countryside. His BJP counterpart Atal Behari Vajpayee and Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party (DMKP) General Secretary Hemvati Nandan Bahuguna are looking for friends and party MP's to move in with. Others like Satish Agarwal (BJP) have left Delhi in disgust and many more may have to follow suit.

To make ends meet, men like the Janata Party's Syed Shahabuddin, and the BJP's Agarwal and Ram Jethmalani are picking up the threads of interrupted legal careers. Stormy petrel Subramaniam Swamy is off to Harvard University on a six-week assignment to teach mathematics for economists, as if to prove the truth of his friend Professor Roderick McFarquahar's observation that "there is life after politics".

Deprived of the forum of Parliament, almost every major opposition leader is planning to either write a book, or start a magazine or newspaper column. In such diverse and often desperate ways are the vanquished opposition stalwarts trying to regain their feet, to readjust to a dramatically changed situation. But one hope they all share is the conviction that when the political waters calm down they will bob back into the reckoning.

As if the Lok Sabha reversals weren't enough, when the Opposition's tired and defeated MP's trooped back to the capital in the last days of December, the Lok Sabha House Committee, which looks after MP's accommodation, put salt in their wounds by asking them to vacate their houses by January 31. That date is past and the ex-MP's now await with dread the arrival of the Estate Office's eviction squads. Alternative accommodation is hard to come by in the capital, where rents and property values have skyrocketed in the past few years. Jethmalani plans to buy a house in Delhi and asked his daughter to sell off her apartment in Bombay. But, he rues, "Now I realise that the money we got for the Bombay flat is not sufficient to buy a home in Delhi. A three-bedroom place on Ferozeshah Road is being quoted at Rs 17 lakh." Jethmalani will miss the vast expanse of lawn of his Janpath home. But, what he misses more is the lack of understanding of the House Committee which has rejected his plea for an extension.

"The heavens will not fall if the new MP is asked to wait for a few months," he says. "I waited for a year when I was elected in 1977." If the Estate Office trucks turn up he plans to move to the home of industrialist and former Janata Party MP Viren Shah. If he cannot do this, then he will move to Bombay where he still owns an apartment.

Bahuguna too plans to return to his home in Allahabad if he doesn't find suitable arrangements in Delhi. Fellow party member Tarakeshwari Sinha offered to let him use her house in Delhi's South Extension as she is moving back to Bihar, but Bahuguna says: "It is too sophisticated for a rough man like me."

Chandra Shekhar is quite firm about moving out of Delhi even if he is able to retain the house he has lived in for the last 17 years. "There is too much futile activity here," he complains. "I don't want people hanging around me 24 hours a day." He will commute daily between Bhondsi and Delhi, a driving time of about 40 minutes, even if it means making some adjustments in the working habits of his party secretariat.

Vajpayee has asked the Government to let the presidents of recognised parties retain government accommodation. Former Congress party president Kamaraj had a house," he says. "I am a single man; I can make do with one room." But the single room in the Vithalbhai Patel House legislators hostel where Vajpayee may be forced to shift provides a striking contrast to his present sprawling bungalow on Raisina Road near Parliament House. Another alternative is to share the house of BJP Rajya Sabha member Piare Lal Khandelwal, who is also a bachelor.

While Vajpayee himself may not be thinking of moving out immediately, he is unsettled by enquiries from prospective tenants of his bungalow. Some overzealous aide of Minister of State for Planning K. R. Narayanan, has been making enquiries about Vajpayee's plans. A day or so later Vajpayee ran into Narayanan at a state banquet and asked why he was keen to move into the house. An apologetic Narayanan averred that he was not aware of the enquiries being made by his staff. Vajpayee was touched that Narayanan still addressed him as 'Sir', a habit from when Vajpayee was foreign minister and Narayanan an ambassador.

VAJPAYEE says that unlike him, people with families can find housing quite a problem in Delhi. This is proving particularly true for Shahabuddin who has four of his six children staying with him, and his DMKP counterpart Ram Vilas Paswan. Shahabuddin occupies a South Avenue flat as a guest of another Janata Party General Secretary, Bapu Kaldate. "I am here at the sufferance of the Rajya Sabha Secretariat. The moment they want it, I will be out on the street," he says. But come what may he has decided to stay on in Delhi and remain active in politics, which is why he gave up a foreign office career. Besides, he says some important members of his community have asked him to stay in Delhi. "I look on myself as a mohtasib (accountant) on behalf of the community," he says. "I have no property, no bank balance," and living in Delhi can be expensive.

Paswan too says: "I will keep my family in Delhi till I am forced to leave or am otherwise helpless. I can take a house on rent but people like us are not used to staying in trans-Jamuna colonies. We have to be in the heart of the town."

It is, of course, understandable that most MP's who have been using the highly subsidised bungalows and flats provided to them want to stay on for as long as they can. Only about 50 of the over 200 MP's who have suddenly found themselves on the eviction list actually vacated their accommodation by the January 31 deadline. Some 127 others—including some from the Congress(I)—sought extensions on one pretext or other. Some cited "illness of cousin" or "illness of servant". Others wanted to retain just the servant's quarter or the garage.

Eduardo Faleiro, chairman of the House Committee, said the committee had decided to grant no extension except on the ground of personal illness and there were only four or five such cases. The committee will start legal proceedings in a few days against those who have not vacated. "We don't want to be harsh," he said, "but we want people to take notice that they cannot stay on indefinitely. The Chandra Shekhars and the Vajpayees will probably leave on their own, but others have asked for indefinite extensions."

There is a special rush for bungalows, some of which the opposition stalwarts are occupying, because a large number of former speakers, governors, chief ministers, judges and ministers have got elected. Some of them get priority and are entitled to bungalows rather than flats.

Jethmalani: house-hunting

But housing is just one of the hassles confronting the former MP's. Readjusting to the life of an ordinary mortal is another. Some, who have served for several years, find they have no life and career outside Parliament. Their only profession is politics and politics is much easier to practice when you have a government house in Delhi and all other major expenses like travelling, telephone, and secretarial services are taken care of. In any case, most MP's know of no other way of earning a living. Bahuguna says expenses are so high that an honest MP cannot live within his salary and perquisites. Bahuguna was supported by his son, a lawyer in Allahabad, who sent him Rs 4,000 per month. He laughs off his present predicament by reciting an Urdu couplet: "Gardishey ayyam tera shukriya, humne har pehloo se duniya dekh lee." (I am grateful to these difficult times for I have now seen life in all its aspects.)

"Profession?" Paswan asks incredulously, "what profession or business can people like me get into after having been bitten by the political bug?" He is trying to organise a dalit sena of backward youth from the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes. They have offered to send him Rs 100 a month from each of the 15 Bihar districts where the sena has a strong organisation. He thinks this Rs 1,500 and his MP pension will be enough. Some former MP's like lawyers Shiv Shankar and Jethmalani, who are well reputed in their profession, should have no major problems. "I do enough practice to keep myself in reasonable comfort and I plan to continue like this," says Jethmalani. "Why the hell should I not take life a little easy. I am 61 and deserve some rest and relaxation."

After he returns from Harvard, Swamy plans to write a regular column for Imprint magazine. "Some of my colleagues will have to open paan shops," he quips. "I get a pension of Rs 750 , I have a free house to shift to (belonging to his wife), I don't drink or smoke or maintain hangers-on. What more do I need? This is a question you should ask Chandra Shekhar and Vajpayee." Even in defeat, Swamy cannot avoid a dig at his two bugbears, who had earlier forced him to leave the BJP and Janata Party in quick succession.

WHATEVER else they might be planning, paan shops were not part of their plans. Vajpayee plans to travel around to his party units. After 27 uninterrupted years in Parliament he now plans to read and write. "Politics never gave me full satisfaction even when I was a minister," he reminisces. "I got more satisfaction as a journalist, and when I wrote poetry, I felt I was creating something. Politics is just hawai baaten (airy talk)." But he will miss Parliament, a devalued forum but one that he used tellingly. "Parliament should act as a mirror to reflect people's aspirations, anger and frustration. But the rules are interpreted in such a way that the Opposition cannot have its say."

Craggy-faced, dishevelled Chandra Shekhar has no regrets about Parliament. He was never regular in attendance, and in any case, he feels, much of what the Opposition had to say went unreported by the media. Shekhar is bitter about the way the press, as he sees it, has become a captive of the Government. With Parliament no longer available as a forum and the press inattentive, he plans to disseminate his views by reviving the Young Indian, the bulletin he edited as a Young Turk, and which was closed down during the Emergency. "I hope it will start appearing in two or three months time," he says. "With our wide party base it should sell, if we can distribute it properly."

Others are also getting ready to dabble in journalism. Shahabuddin plans to write a column in the Urdu magazine Nai Duniya, apart from editing a small booklet he publishes called Muslim India. Bahuguna too has a book in mind describing his experiences over the past 40 years, including undisclosed details of his on-again, off-again relationship with Mrs Gandhi. "If I had not supported Mrs Gandhi in 1969 (when he was general secretary of the Congress party) she would not have remained prime minister and the Congress Party would never have split. Main itna baawla ho gaya tha Indira Gandhi key liye," he says. (I was mad about Mrs Gandhi.)

The resolve of so many opposition politicians to remain in Delhi at the centre of national politics, is born of the conviction that Rajiv's honeymoon with the euphoric electorate will soon be over and the Opposition will once again become relevant. "We may be beaten but not defeated," says Chandra Shekhar who is prepared to bide his time but won't quit politics. Vajpayee too will fight one more election—"I have to avenge my defeat." He will consider contesting a by-election but is in no hurry. What concerns Vajpayee is the trend of political events and the walls of suspicion raised between politicians of different persuasions. As if to illustrate precisely this point, the Government has built a wall in place of the hedge that separated his home from former finance minister Pranab Mukherjee's. "In Nehru's time our bona fides were never suspect, but now even the prime minister calls us unpatriotic."

It's hardly surprising, then, that with so many mundane preoccupations to worry them, the stalwarts of the Opposition are unable to think of political platforms and unity. If that doesn't change, then the banishment is likely to prove a much longer affair The opposition leaders however are convinced that the tide will change and sweep them back to the shore from the bleak open sea on which they are helplessly bobbing about now. —RAMINDAR SINGH

If change is what our vote was about, the change should be for the better.

Do we know what needs to be changed, and into what?

A VOTE FOR CHANGE

Will the change bring us closer to the values we have always cherished? The values willed to us by Gandhiji, who staked his life to root the communal virus out of our people? Who left no material possessions behind.

By Jawaharlal Nehru, who after seventeen years as Prime Minister had only the royalties on his books to his name.

By Lal Bahadur Shastri whose assets after eighteen years of ministerial office were a few unpaid bills.

Change should mean a rediscovery of this lost heritage — a heritage of public ethic equal to any.

Where has this proud heritage gone? Whichever way you turn you see the face of corruption which is fast changing into criminality.

A criminality which showed its ugly face in the politically inspired mobs which held the capital of this country to ransom in the opening days of November.

A criminality which allows the killers of innocent men, and children to go unpunished. Which elevates the guilty to public office. Which sets two standards of justice in our secular state: one for the killers of one community, the other for those killed because they are of a different community.

This must change if we want to rediscover our lost heritage of propriety in public office. If we want to take our country forward.

The first step is to free ourselves from fear, fear to speak our mind.

To watch every action of those we have voted into power.

To protest every infringement of the law.

To demand punishment of the guilty, whatever their status.

To point to the misuse of public office at every step, whether in the cynical or vulgar use of power, or in the indifference to public accountability, or in the monopoly of the media.

We must learn to recognise the victimised, the threatened, the discriminated, and by our actions remind them that they are not alone. That all those concerned with the country's future are with them in their search for a just and human society.

That is the beginning of our movement — a movement which seeks to restore to the nation the rule of law and the secular tradition.

That is the meaning of change.

For the rule of law and the secular tradition.

SPY SCANDAL

Spilling the Beans

INDIA'S latest espionage thriller could only have one title—The Case of the Cooperative Spy. Ever since his dramatic arrest and subsequent identification as the spider at the centre of the spy web, Coomar Narain, the meek-looking wheeler dealer has been singing like the proverbial canary. As a result, by last week, the number of arrests had risen to 16 and two more Delhi-based diplomats from the Polish and East German embassies were given their expulsion orders.

In fact, few fictional spy thrillers could have matched the rapid twists and turns in the plot. Apart from the intriguing involvement of the Eastern Bloc in the scandal, the new arrests included Yogesh Maneklal, Narain's employer, and two other businessmen dealing in exports to the Soviet Union. As a fitting finale, two senior bureaucrats including the secretary, defence production, took leave prior to premature retirement.

The dramatic developments followed confessions made in camera by seven of the key members of the ring including Coomar Narain. According to investigating authorities, the new facts that have emerged from the confessions are:

► Yogesh Maneklal was apparently aware of Coomar Narain's covert activities and may have even helped the French in their bid to obtain highly sensitive information.

Maneklal coming out of court: stout denials

PRAMOD PUSHKARNA

► The two Indian exporters, V.K.Aggarwal and Ashok Jaidka, were actually working for the Soviets by passing on information obtained from H.N.Chaturvedi, an assistant in the Commerce Ministry.

► In the last two years, the French and the Soviets have had unrestricted access to practically all top secret documents that went through the prime minister's office.

► Polish and East German agents also had access to confidential information in an operation separate from the Soviet one.

The key piece in the puzzle is the confessional statement made by Coomar Narain in the court of the Metropolitan Magistrate on February 4. The confession took three solid hours to complete and covered 15 foolscap pages. Earlier, his wife had tried to get him to change his mind about confessing but Narain brushed aside her pleas saying; "I just want to get rid of it all." The most sensational revelation was his admission that he had been collecting information on behalf of his employers, Maneklal & Co, for the last 25 years. He, however, clarified that the espionage angle only started in 1972.

According to his statement, most of his network of contacts were assistants and private sec-

SLM MANEKLAL

On the Move

SLM MANEKLAL is, or was till its embarrassing involvement in the recent spy scandal, a company on the move. It was originally founded in 1948 as T.Maneklal by Trikamlal Maneklal Chamdawalla, who understandably dropped his last name. He was a self-made man and the firm started off in textiles. Later, it diversified into medium engineering, industrial rubber and also as agents for foreign companies.

In June, 1977, T. Maneklal amalgamated into SLM Maneklal, SLM being an acronym for Swiss Locomotive and Machine Works, a Swiss firm manufacturing diesel engines, blowers and water ring pumps. SLM's collaboration with Maneklal, however, dates back to 1960. It has been a successful marriage. In 1976-77, Maneklal's sales stood at Rs 4.69 crore. In 1977-78, the year of the amalgamation, sales jumped to Rs 10.90 crore. Its 1983-84 sales were Rs 23.94 crore of which exports accounted for a total of Rs 2.26 crore.

Maneklal's most recent successes have been in the Eastern Bloc countries. Last year, it received a number of orders for textile machinery from the USSR, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia and Vietnam. Ironically, on the day the present head of the company, Yogesh Maneklal, was arrested, the firm had just concluded preliminary negotiations for a Rs 14-crore export order to Czechoslovakia.

Significantly, another recent area the company has diversified into is defence. Currently, Maneklal supplies special capacity blowers and Rikki Board floats and has recently got orders from Bharat Heavy Plates and Vessels for refrigeration equipment as well as armoured plates for tanks. The firm is also the agent for the supply of sophisticated helium refrigeration equipment for the Atomic Energy Commission.

In addition, Maneklal has technical collaboration or agency agreements with companies in France, Austria, Switzerland, West Germany and Japan. It represents two big Polish companies dealing in marine equipment and in August 1984 became the agents for Weatherford International, an American company which manufactures oil drilling equipment and the Italian company, Unionoil Manuli. Maneklal has submitted tenders to the Oil and Natural Gas Commission worth Rs 7 crore on behalf of the two companies but is still to obtain any major contracts.

retaries numbering around 30 who had worked at various periods in key ministries like defence and industry. Narain has claimed that he was collecting the information on behalf of his employers who were in turn passing it on to their clients. "I made my lakhs while they made their crores," he is reported to have told the court. He also says that he was passing on information to Colonel Alain Bolley, the French deputy defence attache expelled earlier. Narain has admitted that most of the information he managed to collect related to the Defence Ministry, foreign policy, the economy, planning, industrial policy and decisions and other "sensitive" subjects.

But his confession also indicated that he was selling the information to anybody else who wanted it. That was how investigating sleuths stumbled across the parallel operation taking place involving the Eastern Bloc countries. On January 26, in the course of his daily interrogation, Narain mentioned that he used to sell information to a man called H.N. Chaturvedi at the rate of Rs 1,000 per document. Investigations revealed that Chaturvedi was an assistant in the ministry of commerce. Once Chaturvedi realised the game was up, he implicated Aggarwal and Jaidka.

Chaturvedi, who said he has known Narain for the last 12 years, admitted that he was supplying the information to Aggarwal and Jaidka who were apparently passing it on to diplomats in the Polish and East German embassies. Aggarwal is based in Delhi while Jaidka operates from Ludhiana. Though the two have not yet made any confessional statements, they have admitted to being in touch with representatives of the East German and Polish embassies.

Aggarwal started his career in the army when he took a short service commission. He then worked as a corporate executive before starting his own outfit, Gangur Impex, exporting chemicals and consumer items to eastern Europe, the Soviet Union and China. The main bulk of his business, however, was with the Soviet Union. Jaidka is a self-made businessman who started off with a small hosiery shop in Ludhiana's Nanumal Chowk. In 1977, he bagged export orders to the Soviet Union and is today a leading hosiery exporter with orders worth an estimated Rs 2.8 crore a year. Last December, he spent 10 days in the Soviet Union, ostensibly on a business trip. In fact Jaidka and Aggarwal are very close.

But the bigger surprise was clearly Coomar Narain's implication of his boss, Yogesh Maneklal, in the sordid spy saga. Immediately after Narain's arrest, Maneklal had been picked up for questioning but had been released. Another director in the company, D.P. Antia, was also questioned about certain telex messages he had sent to Maneklal asking for information about a tender and also relating to the transfer of government officials.

Investigating officials are closely examining not just Maneklal's French connection but his Soviet ones as well. The firm's dealings with the Soviet Union and Eastern European countries have increased dramatically in recent years, specifically with Bulgaria and Czechoslovakia apart from the Soviet Union and Vietnam. On the day of his arrest, Maneklal had just signed a Rs 14 crore contract to supply machinery to Czechoslovakia.

In fact, investigating officials say that there was considerable Soviet pressure on the Indian Government to suppress the eastern European angle in the spy scandal. Unlike in the case of Bolley, the two diplomats were quietly expelled and it was only after they had left that the story was broken in the newspapers. Till last week, there was no official confirmation apart from the usual "no comment" offered by various external affairs spokesmen.

In an application on February 11 asking to be released on bail, Maneklal contended that he had been arrested "only on suspicion" and there was no independent evidence against him. But the counsel for the investigating authority countered that the confession of Coomar Narain showed "full complicity" of Maneklal in the case. He also contended "this is a serious nature of spying case (sic) of national importance having international ramifications. The accused Maneklal is involved in conspiracy with other accused persons including Coomar Narain, the kingpin in this espionage case."

Whether or not Maneklal is guilty seems to be in some doubt. But with each confession exposing yet another link in the espionage chain it is obvious that the full story of India's biggest spy scandal is a long way from being written. In fact, what has surfaced so far could be merely the prologue. Even Home Minister S.B. Chavan told INDIA TODAY last week that the Government was not deciding on taking corrective action "till everything crystallises".

THE ASSASSINATION

Tardy Progress

THE HIGH-POWERED team investigating Mrs Indira Gandhi's assassination seems to be in a tunnel with no prospects of a light at the end of it. Not that it hasn't made much headway, but the undeniable fact is that apart from nabbing the immediate conspirators, it has failed to come up with answers to key questions, or uncover any larger conspiracy behind the act.

After recording the statements of some 150 witnesses, the investigating team led by a veteran officer from the Andhra Pradesh police cadre, Anand Ram, submitted an interim charge-sheet in the court of Additional Chief Metropolitan Magistrate S.L. Khanna. The charge-sheet contains no surprises. It indicts surviving assailant Satwant Singh. Others figuring prominently are Balbir Singh, sub-inspector in the prime minister's security guard, and Kehar Singh, uncle of the slain assassin, Beant Singh. Significantly, Simranjeet Singh Mann, who was arrested last November as he tried to cross into Nepal from Bihar and was once regarded as a prime suspect, is not named as a conspirator. The reason is simple: officials have so far been unable to obtain any evidence that Mann visited Delhi before the assassination although Satwant and other witnesses have testified that he had, indeed, visited Beant Singh.

A. Ram

But in handing in an interim charge-sheet, the investigators have kept their options open. The precaution is a necessary one. The charge-sheet alleges that Beant and Satwant were part of the conspiracy, but it fails to come up with all the answers. Some of the unknowns:

- Were Beant and Satwant acting on their own?
- Was there any conspiracy to kill Beant Singh?
- Was Kehar Singh the only person to motivate Beant Singh as suggested in confessions recorded by the police?
- Why did the first conspiracy (INDIA TODAY, December 15, 1984) allegedly hatched by Beant and Balbir fail?
- What prompted Beant to pick on Satwant as an accomplice?

One problem is that the Ram team didn't come into the picture right away.

Chinese royalty wore silks for a few thousand years before their master weavers could present them with the 'Crêpe de Chine'. Since then, crêpes have represented the finest skill and technique of the weaver and his loom.

At our new fabric making complex at Vareli, one out of every eight trained weavers is selected to be a proud De Chine weaver. Made through a difficult combination of separately treated warp and weft, what makes a De Chine special is its half-matte-half-shiny crêpe appeal and its non-slip silky drape. Its muted sheen and natural fall render it indistinguishable from pure silk crêpes.

and Satwant, for example, was interrogated by several agencies giving him ample time to think out his answers and get a feel of the line being adopted by his interlocutors. Satwant was first questioned by the Delhi Criminal Investigation Department (CID), followed by a stream of sleuths from the Intelligence Bureau, the Research and Analysis Wing and the Central Bureau of Investigation, not to mention the Ram team. As one official confessed: "We are now at a stage where we don't know whether Satwant is leading us up the garden path or giving us positive leads."

The confusion that arose from the multiplicity of investigating authorities was evident in the manner in which Mrs Gandhi's special assistant was implicated in the case. R.K. Dhawan's statement was recorded in the course of the investigations but the Ram team was taken aback when Satwant's lawyer said in court that Satwant had been forced to sign blank sheets of paper and implicate both Mann and Dhawan.

Not that the Ram team itself has been free from controversy. That all has not been well was suggested by the sacking of the chief investigating officer, R.P. Kapoor in January and the reported decision of K.D. Nayar a deputy inspector general of police from the Central Industrial Security Force to quit the team. It is also alleged that some persons picked up for questioning in connection with the first conspiracy were let off without charges being pressed though a Reserve Bank employee, a contractor for the New Delhi Municipal Corporation, and a businessman were allegedly implicated in it. As it is, the fate of the investigation seems to hang on a most unlikely thread: the credibility of Satwant Singh.

P.K. KAUL

Loan Mela

FOR WEEKS an anonymous cyclostyled sheet had been doing the rounds—with copies addressed to the prime minister, finance minister, the governor of the Reserve Bank and others. No one took notice of the allegations concerning a housing loan given by the Central Bank to finance secretary P.K. Kaul, until the subject hit the front page of a Delhi newspaper. Suddenly, the man who is the Government's new cabinet secretary was embroiled in a messy controversy. Inevitably, the question arose as to whether the newspaper report had been a deliberate leak from Kaul's rivals for the top slot in the civil service. But this quickly became of only academic interest with Kaul's appointment as cabinet secretary.

The deal between Kaul and the Central Bank nevertheless raises embarrassing questions. Some three years ago, Kaul (who was then defence secretary), signed up a Rs 7.5 lakh loan with the bank to build his house in the New Okhla Industrial Development Area (NOIDA), just across the Delhi-Uttar Pradesh border. Late last year, with the house nearly complete, the bank signed a lease agreement with Kaul. The bank was to shift its NOIDA branch from a busy main road to Kaul's house in a more remote locality—at a rent of Rs 14,500 compared with the earlier rent of Rs 3,500. Kaul's monthly repayment obligation on his loan was Rs 12,500, and the bank lease would run out in seven years. At that point of time, Kaul would get possession of his house at a cost that would be no more than the tax he would pay on his rental income, less the permissible deductions.

The obvious question suggested itself. Why did the bank take Kaul's house on rent for such a short period, at a price that seemed too high for NOIDA? Kaul told INDIA TODAY: "I had taken permission from the Government. And the timing of the newspaper report appears strange. I can assure you there is absolutely nothing unusual in these transactions. And all the transactions were effected before I became finance secretary."

Kaul's NOIDA house (top) and the earlier branch office

HARI OM GULATI

HARI OM GULATI

Nevertheless, a visit to the area showed that barely 400 feet from Kaul's house the ground floor of another building was being let out for Rs 1,200 And a local real estate agent offered to let the top floor for no more than Rs 1,100. Also, carpenters were still putting the finishing touches to Kaul's building, three months after the property was rented to the bank.

It was also discovered that the local residents' association had pleaded against shifting the branch, that the previous branch manager had advised against the shift, and that the police had said the new location was unsafe.

A Central Bank official explained the high rent by saying "The bank has to pay since the owner has to make modifications to the house to accommodate the bank." Central Bank Chairman B.V. Sonalkar merely said: "Unlike other banks, we are absolutely scrupulous about renting premises. We have given loans for houses to hundreds of our clients."

The Government too has clearly seen nothing objectionable. But a senior civil servant put his finger on the central issue when he said: "Let me put it this way. I would not get into a deal like this."

INDO-SRI LANKA RELATIONS

Positive Signals

THEY arrived within hours of each other and left in much the same fashion. One epitomised hope, the other despair. One's arrival was scheduled, the other, a victim of bizarre circumstance. Together, however, they could not have more symbolised the often tragi-comic paradoxes and pulls of Sri Lanka's festering Tamil crisis.

On the night of February 9, a scheduled Air Lanka flight from Colombo landed at Bombay carrying the stocky figure of Sri Lanka's Minister for National Security, Lalith Athulathmudali.He was en route to New Delhi for a meeting with Indian Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, a meeting that symbolised a resumption of the interrupted dialogue between the neighbours over the Tamil issue.In the early afternoon of January 10, a Zaire Cargo aircraft bound for Colombo made a distress landing at Trivandrum at the opposite end of India's western coast carrying a sinister payload—arms and ammunition covertly supplied by Jordan meant to help Sri Lanka's trigger-happy security forces combat the Tamil extremists in the northern part of the island.

The two events had an even more common significance.Both were, in a sense, the result of miscalculations. The British pilot of the Zaire Cargo aircraft misjudged the amount of fuel he would require to reach Colombo. He had taken off from Amman and refuelled at Muscat before taking a flight path that would skirt the southern tip of India.Off the Trivandrum coast, the fuel gauge was registering an alarming low and the pilot radioed an SOS to Trivandrum airport tower to say he was making an emergency landing.It was an ironical—and embarrassing twist of fate that led to the cargo of the aircraft and its destination being known just when Athulathmudali and Rajiv Gandhi were exchanging hearty handshakes in New Delhi.

Athulathmudali, on his part, was really standing in for his president, J.R. Jayewardene to whom the original invitation had been extended by the Indian side.Jayewardene, the man who holds the only key to the eventual solution of the Tamil problem, declined the invitation.In that sense, Athulathmudali, despite his high-profile image, was merely a conduit, thus aborting any hope of dramatic breakthroughs in the impasse.

Notwithstanding that, the meeting did represent a major step forward.Despite the war drums being loudly beaten in Sri Lanka, there is now a growing realisation on the part of the country's leadership that Rajiv Gandhi's ascension has turned the Tamil issue into a different ball game altogether.The signals were made more evident last fortnight.

Before his departure for the conducive climes of Male in the Maldive Islands for a meeting of South Asian Regional Cooperation (SARC), India's new Foreign Secretary Romesh Bhandari had been instructed to stress the urgent need for a high-level meeting between the two countries with his counterpart, R. Jaisinghe. Jaisinghe, in turn, passed on the message to Colombo and the response came as a welcome departure from the combative stance of the past few months.

That Rajiv was determined to push home the opportunity was made even more evident. At his personal intervention, the Zaire Cargo aircraft with its deadly cargo intact was allowed to leave Trivandrum for Colombo, thus defusing another potential explosive in the minefield of Indo-Sri Lankan relations.The message had clearly gone home.After his hour-long meeting with Rajiv without the benefit or hindrance of aides, even Athulathmudali admitted that the aircraft's release "would not have been possible in different circumstances", meaning the late Indira Gandhi.

In Colombo, before his departure, Athulathmudali's visit had been seen as just another opportunity for Colombo to air its well-known grievances over India's role in the Tamil crisis.The Daily Times, the government mouthpiece, stated that Athulathmudali would "have the opportunity of presenting Prime Minister Gandhi with Colombo's point of view about the difficulties created by terrorists functioning from bases in Tamil Nadu".

That was undoubtedly Colombo's intention. Athulathmudali arrived bearing a detailed list of camps in Tamil Nadu where extremists were ostensibly being given arms training. But by the end of the meeting, Rajiv had clearly disarmed Athulathmudali enough to give the latter's remark that the talks had been "most constructive and helpful" a ring of authenticity.

According to informed sources, Rajiv once again reiterated his desire for a meeting with Jayewardene in the near future and also extracted the promise that till then the dialogue between India and Sri Lanka would be maintained and made more frequent.Regarding Colombo's complaint that the Tamil United Liberation Front (TULF) should not be allowed such open and instant access to and support from the Indian leadership, the Indian prime minister is understood to have convinced Athulathmudali that the TULF represented the only conduit for convincing the Tamil militants to curtail their extremist activities till a political solution to the problem could be finally thrashed out.

But that, obviously, will be a long and bruising process. Jayewardene at the moment does not seem to be in the mood for finding a political solution which would necessarily entail his having to make concessions to the Tamils which, in Sri Lanka's current antagonistic atmosphere, could be construed as a sign of weakness rather than strength. There are other political compulsions in operation as well and he will require a lot of convincing before any real and solid foundations can be laid. On the same day that Rajiv and Athulathmudali were meeting in Delhi, Jayewardene announced at a meeting that India could "no longer be considered a friendly country" if it continued supporting the Tamil extremists.

On the actual battlefield, the war between the Sri Lankan security forces and the Tamil guerrillas showed no signs of letting up. Last week, the reputed London newspaper, The Times' south Asia correspondent reported the cold-blooded massacre of 32 innocent men in the Tamil-dominated Mannar area, a report stoutly denied by Colombo. Almost simultaneously, the Eelam People's Revolutionary Liberation Front (EPRLF), one of the extremist guerrilla groups, claimed that it had "smashed" the Karainagar naval base located 30 km from Jaffna and killed 150 Sri Lankan navy personnel. EPRLF spokesmen said that they had "captured" the base after a four-hour battle and destroyed a number of naval gunboats.

In Colombo, however, such claims are no longer given the prominence they once were and the hyper-active political grapevine was instead buzzing with the possible fallout from the talks between Athulathmudali and Rajiv Gandhi. In a dramatic departure from his usually aggressive posture, Athulathmudali's first remarks on returning to the island laid special emphasis on the fact that Rajiv had personally intervened at his request to allow the Zaire Cargo aircraft to leave for Colombo. That in itself indicated that he had left Delhi somewhat impressed by the prime minister's genuine desire to bridge the growing divide between the two countries. But whether that would be reciprocated can only depend on the moods and motivation of one man—Junius Richard Jayewardene—in whose court the ball is now squarely placed.

ST. STEPHEN'S COLLEGE

Dirty Linen

IN THE thick of the night, last fortnight, there was a burglary at St Stephen's College, the holiest of Delhi University's holy cows. A brigade of morally misguided young men moved quickly and stealthily in the dark, crept into the out-of-bounds ladies common room (LCR), broke open the lockers of their female fellow students and escaped with all the female clothing they could find, leaving behind the cryptic message: "Jack the LCR robber robs again."

The morning after, all hell broke loose. Fluttering from the red brick balcony of the prestigious college were women's clothes—shorts, skirts and shirts. Splashed on the walls of the defiled common room was a "chick chart" with the names of the top 10 Stephen's beauties and headlined 'The Terrific Ten'. On another wall ran the obscene slogan: "The bra precedes the breast, without the bra women's lib is best." Operation Undercover had been a success. Within an hour came the journalists, swarming like bees, outraged at the outrage of female modesty. Armed with cameras, flash bulbs and zoom lenses they arrived to seek out the hearts of darkness hidden in the haloed precincts of the college.

For St Stephen's—reputed to draw always the cream of students into its portals every year—it was an internal crisis, no less. The college has always maintained a private dignity and distance from the noises that the rest of the university periodically makes. This was a shameful public expose and more so because some of the college's own women teachers had invited the press in to see the appalling scene. "If any girl's modesty is outraged, mine is too," one is reported to have said. "The boys are potential rapists."

Principal John H. Hala insisted, however, that it was "a domestic issue... uncultured but not immoral". A virtual emergency was declared to enable the college to solve its problems at "home". A round the clock vigil was imposed, student squads posted at all entry points to bar the invasion of outsiders and Section 144 was imposed banning large public gatherings. The college magazines Kooler Talk (lovingly called Katy) and Spice were also banned and an inquiry ordered into the despicable affair. The next day, as the law and order situation deteriorated further with loyal Stephanians pouncing on the invading press, the CRPF was called in. For the first time in 104 years, the stone corridors echoed to the heavy footsteps of marching police guards.

Strangely enough, while almost all the boys and girls of St Stephen's stuck together maintaining that it was "a domestic crisis" and "a family matter" the rest of the town went to town over it. The university rose in arms. The Students Federation of India and the Janawadi Mahila Samiti took out marches to protest against the "acts of vandalism and harassment of girls". "Hum chicks nahin chingari hain" they shouted outside the locked gates of the college. More than a hundred teachers from various university colleges sent a memorandum to Dr Hala claiming that sexual humiliation of girl students could not be considered an internal matter of St Stephen's. The All India Women's Association is said to have demanded that the Government punish the guilty. In another memorandum, teachers asked for greater security measures for women students and an end to "the reign of terror unleashed by college authorities".

A protest march by university students: public exposé

The crisis continued to make front page national news in the dailies: "St Stephen's siege continues", "Culprits at large", "Sex war takes an ugly turn". The public humiliation was new and unpleasant. In a DTC bus when a young man pinched a girl, one passenger turned and sniggered, "Must be a Stephanian." The college was given a new name: UGC, the under garment college. As it happened, the undergarments were totally a media creation. "I don't know who picked up the word," said an M.A. final year woman whose locker had been forced open, "but no one ever left it. Fact is there were no undergarments at all, only sports gear." Similarly with the notorious chick charts. For several years, St Stephen's has had chick, stud and even teacher charts that make periodic appearances on the college notice board. They list, on the basis of physical attributes, the top 10 boys and girls of the college. Although some students don't like it, others find the whole thing fun. "It doesn't bother you in any way," said a third year B.A. girl student, "in fact it's a compliment to be on them."

The recent LCR raid, although it may have been in bad taste, was still a joke, most Stephanians agree. The college has had its share of sexual horseplay before, and usually much worse. In 1979, some students danced nude in front of Miranda House and got away with a few days' suspension. During Holi, another year, some men barged into St Stephen's, molested a number of girls and marched out of the college, scot-free. The agitation this time seems to be a build-up of what has come to be regarded as the lax attitude of the college authorities in dealing with sexual harassment of girls.

However, the crime has been given a punishment this time. Three boys who have confessed to masterminding the operation have been expelled from the hostel and may not be allowed re-admission. But a week later, as passions softened in the mellow February sun, sympathy by and large veered towards the misguided "goondas" thrown out of college for a silly prank. "Just because people thought it was underclothes there was such a hue and cry," said a St Stephen's student. "If they'd known it was only skirts and T-shirts no one would've bothered." Well, crises come and crises go, but this one has at least proved one thing. "It's established our loyalty towards our college," said an M.A. girl student, "it's established that there is something like a true Stephanian."

JAMMU & KASHMIR

Political Thaw?

AS THE wintery freeze in Kashmir thawed, there were signs that the cold relationship between the Congress(I) and ousted chief minister Farooq Abdullah was also showing signs of a brief spring. For the first time since the May 1983 election, Farooq and Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi talked in New Delhi for 40 minutes in what was described as a cordial meeting. A week later, Ghulam Mohammed Shah, the state's shaky chief minister, publicly announced that he was prepared to quit office, but on his own terms. Said he: "I am prepared to reunite with Farooq's National Conference if he accepts total and permanent friendship with the Congress(I) and does not claim the chief ministership of the state." He also made it clear that he would resign only if his entire cabinet was accommodated.

The offer came soon after the conciliatory approach adopted by estranged brother-in-law Farooq towards the Centre, the defeat of Shah's candidates in the Lok Sabha election, and growing infiltration into the valley from across the border. Since July last year, when Shah was catapulted into the driver's seat by the Congress(I), he has been pressing for a strong line against Farooq. Last fortnight, however, he was forced to beat a hasty retreat when it became clear that the Centre was viewing seriously both the recent electoral reverses in the state and the Shah Government's inability to cut into Farooq territory. Admitted a Congress(I) leader from Jammu: "We chose Shah to strengthen those forces friendly with the Congress(I) and the Centre and weaken Farooq's base. But he has not succeeded so far. At this juncture we can't write off Farooq who is willing to cooperate."

In fact, the Congress(I) decided to open a dialogue with Farooq only after he made friendly overtures despite his party's impressive showing in the Lok Sabha poll when it won three out of the five seats it contested. To begin with, Farooq was the first opposition leader to appeal to the people to rally behind Rajiv after the assassination of Mrs Gandhi. He repeated this theme after the Lok Sabha polls, with Begum Abdullah, known for her strong views against the Congress(I), also chipping in. She declared: "We, of India, are totally opposed to any violent action in the valley." While there was no reciprocal response from the Congress(I), Farooq held to his line. In an interview last month he said: "I cannot be ridiculed for my desire to raise additional bridges between Srinagar and Delhi. I do not believe in double standards. I am for friendship with Delhi. And I cannot shut my eyes to the victory of the Congress(I) elsewhere in the country." Again he emphasised that Rajiv "has to be assisted by everyone in his attempts at providing better socio-economic conditions."

Farooq has many milestones to cross before he manages to build bridges with Rajiv. The major stumbling block would appear to be Shah.

The strategy worked. Rajiv's willingness to spare time for Farooq during a parliamentary session and the visit of Argentinian President Raul Alfonsin, indicated the importance he attached to the Kashmir problem. While the two remain tightlipped about details of the meeting, it was clear that an attempt had been made to narrow down the differences between two people who had had no animosity towards each other before entering the political arena. According to sources, however, the discussions went on predictable lines: while Rajiv insisted that Farooq shun what he called his relationship with anti-national elements in the valley, Farooq sought the dismissal of what he described as the 'usurper' Shah Government and the calling of fresh assembly elections. Although they reached no final agreement, they concurred on the need for more meetings.

The road ahead is long and Farooq has many milestones to cross before he finally manages to build bridges with Rajiv. The major stumbling block would appear to be brother-in-law Shah himself. Reacting to the Rajiv-Farooq meeting, Shah's son Muzaffar, who was trounced in the Lok Sabha election by a Farooq nominee, met over a dozen central leaders pleading against any rapprochement with his uncle, and playing on his so-called anti-national activities.

A week after his son's visit, Shah and Deputy Chief Minister Devi Dass Thakur also descended on New Delhi ostensibly to discuss the Seventh Plan with the Planning Commission. But their visit was aimed mainly at undoing the damage caused earlier by Farooq. During their stay both Shah and Thakur called on Rajiv and other central leaders, and emphasised the dangers involved in the rehabilitation of Farooq in the valley. While Shah pleaded for a political strategy, Thakur was interested in administrative actions against Farooq and his former colleagues. Thakur sent the copies of the 'White Paper on Farooq Abdullah' to the Union home minister and the attorney general of India for their opinion on whether a case of sedition and treason could be registered on the basis of evidence compiled by the cabinet committee headed by Thakur. Claiming he was not accusing Farooq of any anti-nationalist act, Thakur alleged: "There is plenty of evidence of the positive encouragement Dr Abdullah and his followers gave to anti-national and secessionist forces."

The White Paper lists instances of extremists being released from custody without due process. But the major problem remains Farooq's reluctance to dissociate himself publicly from men such as Maulvi Farooq and Abdul Ghani Lone. On February 9, when over 100 activists of allegedly secessionist organisations were arrested for celebrating the first death anniversary of the executed killer Maqbool Butt, Lone, who is chief of the Peoples' Conference, called for a hartal in the valley as a mark of respect to Butt, who, Lone charged, "was denied justice by the Central Government." The police, besides arresting extremist elements, also seized handwritten posters containing highly inflammatory slogans and speeches against the Central Government. And there are those who believe that he was soft on Sikh extremists. As long as these doubts remain, the chill between Farooq and the Congress(I) is unlikely to thaw.

PUNJAB

Courting Confusion

EXTREME situations often justify extreme measures. But this can hardly justify the complicated legal devices that are now being applied in Punjab on the plea that they will combat terrorism. In fact, they are turning out to be counter-productive. The special courts were set up under the Terrorist Affected Areas (Special Courts) Act in the aftermath of Operation Bluestar last year to try the several hundred alleged terrorists and secessionists captured from the Golden Temple and in combing operations in Punjab.

But instead of speedily dispensing justice, they are now saddled with hundreds of cases which have clogged the legal process. What makes it worse is that the procedure laid down for the courts under the new act has no respect for the universally accepted principles of natural justice, condemning the accused, in many instances, to prove his innocence without even the assistance of a lawyer. In the words of former Supreme Court judge and the erudite civil liberties champion V.R. Krishna Iyer: "A scared government has tried to meet extremist terror with legal terror which has few parallels in history. This act is worse than the Rowlatt Act of 1919."

The basic fault lay in the way the act was worded, for it did not confine the courts' domain just to cases of terrorism. The act added to their scope through an omnibus clause that included practically every offence under the Indian Penal Code and many other acts, not all of them relating to civil strife. The reach of the special courts extends from murder to dacoity, hijacking to offences under the Telegraph Act. The list does not end here. The special courts are also empowered to take the initiative against suspected offenders even where they have not yet been committed to trial by the police, as well as try suspects for alleged offences unrelated to those which brought them to the special courts.

What these sweeping changes have amounted to is to bring to the special courts practically all the work of the state's 36 sessions courts. Not surprisingly, they're perpetually hard-pressed, unable to focus on their main objective of swift trials for terrorists. Already, just six months after they came into being, the special courts have lists of pending cases that run into years. The bulk of this work has been put under the purview of just three special courts, at Jalandhar, Patiala and Ferozepur.

The Special Courts are perpetually hard-pressed and unable to focus on their main objective of swift trials for terrorists.

By the end of last month, the courts had their files spilling with over 3,700 cases. "We are somehow trying to cope with the work as far as humanly possible," said S.S. Sandhu, the public prosecutor at Patiala. In charge of the special courts is Justice Amrit Lal Bahri, who in spite of having appointed three additional sessions judges at Patiala, Bhatinda and Ludhiana to share his burden, was spending up to 10 hours a day in the court, sometimes disposing of as many as 25 bail applications in a day.

By the end of January, the court in Patiala alone had a backlog of over 1,200 cases, half of which were transferred to the additional sessions judge at Ludhiana, R.L. Anand. Even though he ends up working simultaneously on at least two dozen cases a day, in five months Anand has been able to dispose of a mere 125. His counterpart at Jalandhar, K.S. Bhalla, has done slightly more, taking care of 80 to 90 cases a month out of the 2,000 that have been brought before him.

This increasing burden defeats the very raison d'etre of the new law. Says Ludhiana lawyer Mohinder Singh Grewal: "The accused are brought from far-off places and their advocates cannot keep track of the proceedings. In the courtroom, only the judge, prosecutor and defendant are left to battle it out. No wonder there are frequent confessions." Grewal, who also happens to be the secretary of the north zone unit of the All India Lawyers Union, estimates that the accused in at least half of these trials go undefended.

From every angle the dice is loaded heavily in favour of the prosecution. For example, most experts say that the new act makes it almost impossible for the defendant to get bail. For the law states: "If the court is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for believing that he (the bail applicant) is not likely to commit any offence while on bail, the judge could grant bail. "Since the accused are suspected terrorists, this is a tough condition.

Digitized by Arya Samaj Foundation Chennai and eGangotri

The list of unconventional measures under the act is endless. Among them:

- The trials are to be held in camera.
- The courts need not record names and addresses of the witnesses in their orders or judgements or in any record of the case accessible to the public.
- The court can also direct that the identity of witnesses remain secret.
- A lawyer or litigant disclosing the identity of any witness is liable to one year jail and a fine of up to Rs 1,000.
- The accused has no right to appeal to the High Court. An appeal to the Supreme Court is permitted, but has to be made within 30 days, a period considered too short to complete formalities like getting certified copies of judgements and arranging lawyers.

NOT SURPRISINGLY, most litigants are unable to exercise their right to appeal. Out of the 750 cases decided by all the special courts put together by the end of last month, not even one-third ended up in the Supreme Court. In fact, confession has become the order of the day. A large majority of the accused reach the trial stage only after spending around six months in jail and if the punishment for their offence is jail for around that length, their lawyers advise them to make a confession and go home after spending the few remaining days of the sentence in the jail.

This absurdity is compounded by the fact that none of these courts has as yet taken up the case of any known terrorist. In fact, over 80 per cent of the cases in their bulging bags relate to the Arms Act, 12 per cent to such acts of felony not normally ascribed to terrorists, and the remaining relating to offences under the excise laws, the staple fare in Punjab courts in normal times.

There is widespread cynicism as to the effectiveness of the Act and dozens of tales are rounds. For example, there is the case of a potter in Amritsar whom police arrested on the charge of possessing a spear. Produced in the court five months and 25 days after his arrest, he nodded in the affirmative when the judge asked him if he confessed to his crime. His sentence: six months in jail. Sure enough, the potter was able to return home after five more days in jail.

In cases where a quick confession is not forthcoming, most trials get postponed on account of the absence of witnesses or the defence lawyer. Surprisingly, in spite of all this, there has been little public protest. Even the Akalis have failed to make an outcry. Most people do not seem to have understood the implications of the new law. Except for the Punjab and Haryana High Court Bar Association, which sent an angry 10-page memorandum to the President, prime minister, law minister and the Supreme Court, no other bar association in the country has shown any interest in the plight of the accused in Punjab. But even the concern expressed by the bar in Chandigarh could be viewed as being more selfish than philanthropic. After all, with the right of appeal removed, it is obvious that many lawyers have lost the chance to grab hefty briefs.

The only people fighting the battle against the Act with some determination are veteran trade union leaders Bimla and Satya Pal Dang who, till the other day, were countering the Bhindranwale menace politically in their own small way. They have already achieved modest success with the release of nine petty shopkeepers of Ghanpur in Amritsar district from the clutches of what Dang calls "a vicious anti-democratic law". Says he: "The police had booked the shopkeepers, all Sikhs, on the charge that all of them had raised Khalistan slogans after the murder of Mrs Gandhi. We organised both Hindus and Sikhs and got the police to withdraw the charge." He, however, cautions that trumped up cases like these could only provide "grist to the extremists' rumour mill".

The crowning irony, however, is that most of the 450-odd cases of charges including those against the All India Sikh Students Federation (AISSF) General Secretary Harminder Singh Sandhu and Shiromani Gurudwara Prabandhak Committee (SGPC) President Gurcharan Singh Tohra are to be put on trial in special courts outside Punjab, in Jodhpur and Ajmer in Rajasthan, leaving the Government open to the charge of showing excessive zeal in committing ordinary criminal cases to special courts in Punjab while all the key suspects are in any case being taken care of in the jails in Rajasthan.

It is obvious that the Government has been in an unseemly hurry in Punjab and equally obvious is the fact that its haste may finally prove to be counter-productive. And that is hardly an enviable fate for a state which has ralready suffered so much in the past three years at the hands of the extremists.

Thermax. Certificates of Merit

Thermax was the first in India to introduce a range of macroporous resins; a truly weakbase macroporous anion exchange resin; and tailor-made resins to suit indigenous water conditions.

Thermax was the first to develop a microprocessor-based programme controller for complete automation for water treatment plants.

Thermax has installed plants ranging from capacities of a few litres per hour to one of the largest plants in India at the Chandrapur power station, which has a softening and demineralising capacity of 400,000 litres per hour.

Thermax customers include thermal and nuclear power stations, refineries, and fertilizer and petrochemical projects in India and abroad.

Whether a water treatment project is as large as Chandrapur, as complex as the plant for the Thal Project, or as compact as our installation for Modi Rubber, Thermax will give it everything we've got, which is everything you'll ever need.

MAHARASHTRA

Mindless Mayhem

TRADE UNION rivalries can be bitter. But when they deteriorate into mindless violence, as they did in a tiny Thane flat on the eve of the Lok Sabha elections, it is time to stop and take stock of workers' rights and employers' privileges. In a palpably grotesque expression of crime and punishment, four small daughters of a sweeper were killed in cold blood while their father was away and their terrified mother, Walibai Makwana, was locked in the bathroom. When she emerged from hiding, she identified one of the six persons who ravaged her home as Sebastian D'Souza, President of the Everest Building Products' Employees' Union.

Raghav Makwana, a sweeper now suspended from the Everest company, claims that his children have been slaughtered because of his loyalty to the recognised union led by R.J. Mehta, the Asbestos Cement Engineering and General Industries Employees' Union and, in fact, on the evening of the murder, had got into a scuffle with a member of D'Souza's faction. Fearing for his life, he had stayed away from home—and paid with the lives of his four children. D'Souza and a companion of the night have been arrested by police, but it is doubtful whether the case will so much as come to court or a conviction be obtained.

In this case, inter-union frictions began when the Everest management started flirting with a union floated by that 'king' of trade unionism, Datta Samant, although it had already signed a contract, in November 1980, with Mehta's group. In fact, the management refused to deposit the Rs 1.37 lakh due as house rent to the union trust. However, the Samant affair lasted only so long as it suited the management and the moment it became difficult to 'manage', a new union was floated, with D'Souza switching loyalties again to head this third union.

The Everest case is, in fact, symptomatic of the growing malaise crippling unions and employer-employee relations in Bombay. Over the last 10 years, musclemen and hardened criminals have become regular participating factors in labour disputes with the sole intention of spreading terror by the grace of the union or the management. Mehta notes with regret the unfortunate trend for "liquor addicts, gamblers and absentee workers to get into unions so as to gain legitimacy and protection". The Thane DCP (crime) Arvind Patwardhan points out that at times the unions are merely labels for other activities. The labour commentator for the Maharashtra Times lays his finger on the danger of ulterior union activity when he states that "once these hired hitmen are allowed to infiltrate, the situation goes out of the hand of the union leaders."

FREE PRESS JOURNAL

Blood-spattered bedding of the four victims: heinous crime

In the 1981-82 Bombay textile strike for instance, almost a dozen persons were stabbed to death in attempts to let loose a wave of fear. In the Godrej factory riot case a few years ago, a sub-inspector was stoned to death, but those arrested were soon released for lack of evidence. Following union acrimony in the Crompton Greaves factory, one person was murdered. Seven persons belonging to Datta Samant's union were taken into custody for allegedly being responsible, but they were not convicted. It was little wonder that workers affiliated to the old union quickly changed loyalties.

The police themselves are sceptical about taking active interest in FIR's lodged in union assault cases because once a settlement is arrived at with the management, the charges are invariably dropped. This is what happened, for example, during strikes in the Maharashtra State Cooperative Bank and the Mukund Iron and Steel Company. Although a dozen serious cases of assault and stabbing had been registered, the charges were quickly dropped once an accord was reached.

However, there is no denying the rampant upsurge of violence and instances of uncontrollable aggression are becoming a legion. Even a powerful management like The Times of India group found itself unable to prevent the physical intimidation of its employees by members of Gulab Joshi's Kamgar Utkarsha Sabha trying to swamp the Mumbai Mazdoor Sabha (MMS). No one dared to call the police when the chief reporter of Maharashtra Times Dinoo Ranadive and fellow journalists were slapped and abused in the office of the Bombay Union of Journalists last October. Hassan Khan, member of the recognised MMS, fractured his legs in an attack in broad daylight by rival unionists while he was standing opposite the secretariat building.

In the latest instance of large-scale intimidation, this time featuring striking workers of the National Rayon Corporation (NRC), a security guard was killed outside the factory in Kalyan last November, leading to the arrest of six workers belonging to Samant's General Kamgar Union (GKU). Matters came to a head on January 26 when police fired on workers outside the factory, killing three persons and injuring others. Alleging that the police was acting in collusion with the NRC management, Samant organised a procession in Bombay to protest against "the cold-blooded firing on the working class".

It is not known exactly what prompted the firing: while Samant claims that the police had refused permission for a peaceful flag-hoisting by workers outside the factory premises and that Shiv Sena elements had been instigated into attacking his men with soda bottles from inside the compound, the police version holds that firing was resorted to only after the workers had surrounded the police station about 100 meters from the NRC factory, after tear gas had failed to disperse them. The truth may be known only after a judicial inquiry is held, but the incident highlights once more the fact that in the very predictability of this sequence of events lies the terror. —COOMI KAPOOR

Persisting Problems

IF SILENCE were half consent, Laldenga, the 58-year-old leader of Mizo insurgency, would by now be well on his way to a coronation of sorts, to take over as the interim chief minister of the new state of Mizoram. But last fortnight, political observers were inclined to read a lot more than that in Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi's continuing stoic silence on the Mizoram issue as Laldenga awaited a call from the prime minister's office and a final decision on the fate of the negotiations resumed in October last. By all accounts, it seems, some new complications and doubts had arisen and G. Parthasarathy, chairman of the policy planning committee in the External Affairs Ministry, nominated by the Government to negotiate with Laldenga was trying to work out a final package for settlement. Meanwhile, reports from the Mizo underground headquarters in Bangladesh were encouraging. The Mizo National Front's (MNF) 12-member executive council had okayed the points of agreement reached in the course of negotiations between Laldenga and Parthasarathy so far.

After renewed rounds of talks last fortnight Laldenga was guarded in his hopes of a quick settlement. Said he: "Mr Parthasarathy and I have decided to be optimistic. This is all I will say for now. Whatever we have finalised we must keep under our hats, what is the use of making it public property?" But he admitted that the decisions arrived at during the negotiations so far would have no meaning till the prime minister okayed them and also decided finally on his outstanding demands. "I am waiting for summons from Mr Gandhi. He is very, very busy," Laldenga said, hard put to conceal a new sense of uncertainty.

At least twice last fortnight he rang up Parthasarathy to find out the exact cause of delay. Parthasarathy was non-committal, saying that the prime minister was very busy, what with the follow-up of the six-nation summit and then the visit of the Bhutanese monarch. And now with assembly elections round the corner it was indicated that the silence could in all probability last longer.

But details of a tentative agreement and areas of persisting discord were trickling in. According to sources both in the Government and MNF, with the agreement on the grant of statehood for Mizoram, dissolution of the present Union territory assembly and the installation of Laldenga as the interim chief minister a la the late Sheikh Abdullah, the only major problem that still remained to be sorted out was the exact outlines of special safeguards for the state under Article 371(A) of the Constitution. Drafted for Nagaland in the wake of the Shillong peace accord of 1975, the section states that:

► No Act of Parliament will apply to Nagaland without the approval of the state assembly if it pertains to social and religious practices, customary law, ownership and transfer of land and resources in Nagaland.

► The Governor of Nagaland will have special powers regarding the maintenance of law and order in the state as long as conditions of insurgency and civil disturbances continue.

BHAWAN SINGH

Contrary to his bravado of the past, Laldenga has now begun to talk of the urgent need for peace and a farewell to arms.

The MNF strongly objects to the second part of the section, while finding the first adequate for their needs. "Why should the governor have these special powers? Are these provided in the case of Uttar Pradesh?" asked Laldenga indignantly. He also made hints that besides this the safeguards were more or less acceptable to him, adding, "The safeguards in our case have to be basically as in Article 371(A) but these will have to undergo additions and amendments in keeping with Mizoram's special needs."

But to Laldenga's mind a promise of power along with the accord seems as important as the constitutional safeguards. While fighting shy of accepting that he made the chief minister's chair a prerequisite for settlement he stated that the Congress(I) Government in Mizoram was in any case committed to step down as soon as there was an accord. They said as much in their election manifesto, he says, asserting that this was a major stumbling-block earlier as Brigadier Sailo opposed it all along. In recent weeks he has had a number of meetings with Mizoram Chief Minister Lalthanhawla who was once an underground MNF activist. Last fortnight the assurance was repeated once again by Mizoram Finance Minister Sainghaka whom Laldenga has known as his one-time home minister in the MNF's provisional, underground government.

Contrary to his bravado of the past, Laldenga has now begun to talk of the urgent need for peace and a farewell to arms. "Believe me, every person, every weapon will come out once the agreement is finalised. I don't want to be running a private army," he said, adding that arms, surrender and amnesty were relatively fringe issues as long as the basic political and constitutional demands put forward by him were accepted.

But even if the basic political question was sorted out, more complications will arise in the nitty-gritty of implementation. There is, for example, a wide variance in the Government's estimates and Laldenga's claims of his armed strength. The Government is absolutely disinclined to believe the Laldenga claim that his group has no more than 400-500 trained fighting men sharing less than a total of 200 firearms.

The Government swears by the estimates prepared by its intelligence agencies which have sources in the jungle fastness of Bangladesh's Chittagong Hill Tracts, Sajek Ranges and the Burmese Arakans. According to them the Mizo National Army has at least 600 troops with no less than 450 serviceable firearms. Another factor worrying the Government is the involvement of the Bangladesh Government and the army with the Mizo rebels whose main headquarters is situated at Chhimtalang near Ruma Bazar Cantonment. Similarly, their tactical headquarters, which is used for hit-and-run operations in India is situated at Chhipui in Sajek Ranges, close to the border.

Intelligence men also talk of the existence of an MNF liaison unit led by self-styled Lieutenant-Colonel Lalrinmawia at Ruma Bazar. All this points to a growing link between the Mizo rebels and the Bangladesh Government. Officials in the Union Home Ministry fear that the Bangladesh authorities may help the rebels retain some strength secretly, to be used later as a sort of perpetual blackmail against the Centre. This is what was done by the Phizo group of the Naga rebels after the Shillong peace accord. Government sources point out that such a possibility exists with the Bangladesh authorities regularly using the MNF rebels as a counter to the Shanti Bahini, the ill-clad and ill-trained force of the Buddhist Chakma rebels who have been fighting against the settlement of plainsmen in the hills and frequently inflicting casualties on both the new settlers and the Bangladesh armed forces.

The Bangladesh Government has often accused India of aiding the rebels, —allegations India has denied vehemently—and has sought to use the MNF in a kind of retaliation. It was in the same quest that Bangladesh actively connived to bring about an understanding between the Tripura National Volunteers (TNV) and the Mizo rebels. India now wants to settle the whole problem in one stroke. Said an official: "The Tripuris are not such a threat without the Mizo support. Any agreement with the Mizos now will have to ensure that not only do all of them come overground but also that they do not leave a small group of die-hard advisors behind or sell off their arms to the Tripuris. The fact is, the two insurgencies are linked and therefore cannot be viewed in isolation of each other."

BUT IF the Government is bothered about the possibility of Bangladesh still perpetuating the Mizo insurgency to counter Chakmas, Laldenga and his men intend to do the same in their own way, though they insist that their differences are confined to the Chakma settlers in Mizoram. Last fortnight, Laldenga and his aides belatedly brought the Chakma issue to the forefront of the negotiations demanding the abolition of the Chakma Autonomous District Council as a pre-requisite to the accord. Without this, Laldenga told INDIA TODAY, there can be no peace in Mizoram. He asserts that the Chakmas were never residents of Mizoram and were allowed to come in on valid permits. "First you allowed them to settle down and now you give them autonomy, something they do not even have in their own country. So obviously more of them would like to come into India now." Giving yet another serious twist to his armed bands' chronic rivalry with the Chakmas, Laldenga said menacingly: "If the Chakmas keep coming in the Mizos will have no choice but to resist them."

Laldenga now asserts that an accord will not be possible in the absence of a firm commitment on the Chakmas. In fact the latest charter of demands submitted by the MNF to Parthasarathy has a tell-tale section that reads: "Notwithstanding anything contained in the Constitution the legislative assembly in Mizoram shall have the power to create and abolish autonomous district councils." The objective, obviously is to do away with the autonomous Chakma district council. This is one demand the Government is unlikely to grant and Laldenga almost threatens that this could mean a break in negotiations.

Some officials, however, feel that Laldenga is now trying to use the Chakma issue as a last-minute bargaining counter. Said an official: "He genuinely wants an agreement now. He just does not want to fight any more. But he also realises that he cannot get from the Government the kind of constitutional concessions he is seeking. So, in the form of a clear verdict against the Chakmas he is, in fact, seeking a sop for his people, for whom the so-called Chakma influx is an emotional issue." On the other hand, officials point out that Laldenga has also shown a bit of realism by dropping some of his other impossible demands, like the addition of large tracts of reserve forests in adjoining Assam, Manipur and Tripura states to the new state of Mizoram. "We have to be realistic", said Laldenga, adding, "any such territorial adjustments require amendment to Article 3 of the Constitution and concurrence of chief ministers of all the involved states. We could do without all those complications at this stage."

With Laldenga himself repeatedly talking in terms of "this stage", it is obvious that, tired of two decades of insurgency he too is keen to end his agony. In a rare expression of realism Laldenga told INDIA TODAY: "There is no question of surrendering or accepting defeat. We always realised it was not possible to defeat the Indian Army. But we always wanted to make the point that the Mizos were not associated with the framing of the Indian Constitution and as such could not accept it right away. Now that the changes sought by us are being carried out, our job is done." An agreement now will indeed be his only chance of grabbing power in Mizoram. And that should be a lot for the maverick who went to war with the Union for as little as political dominance in what was, in 1965, a small, landlocked tribal district in Assam.

Wipro Consumer Products Division

Voluntary price regulation on vanaspati (cooking medium) continued during the year. We implemented first phase of modernisation of our Amalner factory resulting in reduced energy consumption, lower operating costs and an improved quality of 'Sunflower' and 'Camel' vanaspati. Currently, we are implementing the second phase of modernisation.

Market for our laundry soap '787' was expanded.

'Bubbles', a special soap for children, was launched in selected states in October 1984. The distribution network has been strengthened to meet the requirements of this important consumer product.

We have received government registrations for manufacture of fatty acid (a raw material for soap) and are implementing this project.

Our export based shoe upper factory with modern machinery and skilled leather technicians, commenced commercial production in October 1984. We are planning for rapid growth in this area.

Business headquarters of the division moved into new office premises at Bombay in November 1984.

Wipro Fluid Power Division

Our performance during the year was satisfactory. Position of leadership in industrial hydraulic cylinders has been consolidated. Shipments and order bookings of mobile hydraulic cylinders have increased. We are developing hydraulic cylinders and systems for specialised market segments, and are establishing separate facilities at Bangalore for the manufacture of very large specialised cylinders. R & D facilities have also been expanded.

It is proposed to establish manufacturing facilities at Tumkur (65 kilometres from Bangalore) for hydraulic tipping systems. A memorandum of understanding was signed with M/s. Nencki AG, Switzerland for technical knowhow.

Today Wipro's fluid power products are known for their reliability, high performance and quality.

Wipro Information Technology Ltd.

Industry growth rate in 1983-84 was significantly below expectation. There has been a recovery during the last six months and we have a healthy order book.

In 1983-84, with almost twice the sales in minicomputers of our nearest competitor, Wipro captured 30% of the market in minicomputers, an achievement confirmed in a survey by Data Quest magazine in July 1984 where Wipro emerged as the undisputed leader.

We offer customer service countrywide through a network of offices, backed by a qualified and experienced team of hardware and software specialists and service engineers. A close working relationship with users helps us develop customised solutions. Today we have a wide range of minicomputers— Wipro Series 86E, Wipro B-250, Wipro Z-650, Wipro Banker and Wipro Wise — with features such as upgradability to meet a user's growing needs. The software developed by Wipro is compatible across the entire range of its systems. Complementing the excellent facilities in our R & D centre is a team of experienced, qualified and dedicated personnel.

Our modern factory at Mysore was substantially expanded during the year.

Our first major export order from the USA for Rs. 3 million worth of populated printed circuit boards designed and manufactured by us, is currently being executed.

Our plan to manufacture and market MICR encoders in technical collaboration with Maverick Microsystems International Inc., USA, is under consideration by the government.

Wipro Systems Ltd.

Incorporated during the year to develop and export sophisticated computer software, the company received necessary government clearances. Products developed so far include office products like Word Processor, Information Manager, Spelling Checker etc. and integrated packages like the Project Management System and Integrated Financial Management System.

Research and Development

Continued leadership in business is possible in the long run only through R & D efforts in all areas of operation. Our R & D expenditure during the year was Rs. 9.1 million (including Rs.3.9 million on capital account) and will significantly increase in the current year. Our R & D centres are recognised by Department of Science and Technology, Government of India. Highly qualified engineers work in these well equipped centres to develop effective customer solutions.

Wipro team

Success of Wipro is in a large measure due to the quality of performance of our human resources. We have a team of 1400 people enabling us to successfully grow in diverse businesses. The management team of 400 employees is young and consists of about 40% postgraduates and 70% engineers. During the year action was taken to integrate employees with diverse backgrounds into Wipro culture. Induction, training and employee development activities have been considerably strengthened during the year.

Finance

Corporation has grown through a well planned deployment of retained earnings and has achieved a compound annual growth in net worth of 25% over the last ten years. The growth in net worth is entirely on account of ploughing back of profits. Diversification over last five years has broadened our business portfolio, and by June 30, 1985, less than 30% of our capital employment will be in traditional business of vanaspati.

Additional infrastructure development cost being incurred in current year to achieve sales growth over next two years is raising breakeven levels substantially.

Directors of Wipro Limited have recommended issue of bonus shares to shareholders in the ratio of one bonus share for every one equity share. Wipro continued to be a non MRTP, non FERA company with shares listed on Bombay Stock Exchange.

Future Policy

For future growth, we would invest in R & D and technology, broaden product portfolio, increase market share and retain maximum profit after tax.

We would improve effectiveness of resource utilisation, aim to maximise annual turnover of capital employment, increase manpower productivity, make operations more cost effective, and achieve higher return on R & D investment.

Wipro beliefs

The most important factors that have contributed to our corporate success is faithful adherence to certain articulated and communicated beliefs. These beliefs represent fundamental socio economic purpose, hold the organisation together and give it direction, and form the foundation and framework for determining company objectives and plans. If an organisation is to meet the challenges of the changing world it must be prepared to change everything about itself except its beliefs.

* Respect for the individual. People are our greatest asset.
* Achieve and maintain a position of acknowledged leadership in the businesses we are in.
* We should pursue all tasks with the objective of accomplishing them in a superior manner.
* Our individual and company relationships should be governed by the highest standard of conduct and integrity.
* Be close to our customer in action, example and spirit, and give superior quality products and services.
* The effectiveness with which management performs its job is measured basically by the long term profits which it achieves for its enterprise.

In summary

It is important for us not to become complacent with success and to be aware that much needs to be done to improve in striving for excellence.

WEST BENGAL

Time for Reckoning

WITH the electorate turning out an even-handed verdict in West Bengal two months ago, politics in the state has been thrown into an unusual kind of flux. Despite being catapulted back into the political reckoning, the Congress(I) shows no signs of breaking out of the seven-year period of sloth. And the ruling Left Front finds itself torn by internal criticism, pulls and tussles among the constitutent parties and by dissatisfaction among the party cadres.

The Congress(I) finds itself in a state of glassy-eyed inactivity after the elimination of its two former power centres: A.B.A. Ghani Khan Chowdhury and Pranab Mukherjee. Asoke Sen, union law minister, says this has succeeded in "destroying entrenched groupism", but that may be a premature judgement at a time when a new party boss for the state is yet to emerge.

The Congress(I) by its inactivity has willy-nilly been drawn into a temporary truce with the ruling Left Front, a truce that the latter desperately wants. In its attempt to secure time for setting its own house in order, the Left Front has adopted an uncharacteristic conciliatory attitude to the Congress(I). Even the well-known Congress-baiter State Finance Minister Ashok Mitra declared that the Centre's attitude towards West Bengal was "positive". All Front ministers have also been instructed to refrain from holding the Centre responsible for every conceivable problem. The accent clearly is on the performance and not criticism.

Unfortunately, although the Front leadership has succeeded in stemming criticism of the Centre, it has not been able to do the same with internal criticism. If anything, the smaller Front constituents are loudly voicing their discontentment with the dominant CPI(M). The Forward Bloc Minister for Higher Education Sambhu Ghosh's public disagreement with the Front's policy of excluding compulsory English teaching at the primary levels became a major controversy last fortnight. CPI(M) leaders in particular condemned the Forward Bloc's open criticism of the Front, arguing that such matters should be raised in the privacy of internal meetings.

Clearly the dominant Front partner, the CPI(M), needs time to neutralise this minor revolt especially since what the Forward Bloc did openly, other Front parties, CPI, and the West Bengal Socialist Party, are doing somewhat more circumspectly. None of the smaller Front partners has any desire to sink with the CPI(M) giant and seem to have decided to work for bolstering their individual party images. As West Bengal Socialist Party leader Biman Mitra says: "A lot of political parties are destined to disappear or become defunct in the near future and what is required is a new non-communist force in the country, something like the socialist parties of Europe."

Asoke Sen

Ashok Mitra

The Congress(I) has been drawn into a temporary truce with the Left Front. But both are confronted by dissensions, throwing West Bengal politics into a strange state of flux.

Having sensed these sub-surface conflicts, the CPI(M) leadership at last fortnight's Left Front meeting quietly bowed down to the analysis and demands of its smaller partners. Front Chairman Saroj Mukherjee declared that the Government's "non-performance" was at the root of the electorate's disenchantment with the Front. Far from taking the smaller partners, especially the Forward Bloc to task, Chief Minister Jyoti Basu only opined that it would perhaps be unwise to presume that any particular government department was to blame for the Government's poor image, implying that instead of blaming each other all Front parties should equally share responsibility for the erosion in their support.

The CPI(M) leadership not only faces the task of convincing its partners that their alliance is credible and viable but also that of containing the rising dissidence within its own ranks. A few district committees of the CPI(M), notably that of the 24 Parganas have reacted sharply against their party's official contention that organisational lapses were mainly responsible for their poll reverses. "It is unfortunate but a small coterie in the leadership of our party is refusing to admit its failures and its past actions that have destroyed all the work the communists have done in Bengal for decades," says a prominent CPI(M) district committee leader in disgust.

In an effort to draw its cadres closer, the CPI(M) leadership sent out questionnaires asking for views on their poll reverses and whether it would be prudent for the Left Front to resign from the Government like Karnataka Chief Minister Hegde did. Significantly, most district committees and branch committees were against the Left Front resigning, chiefly because they feared that the Congress(I) would launch an attack on them, as they did in 1971-72. The lower ranks of the party were however extremely critical of a number of party leaders and ministers whose acts and irresponsible statements alienated large sections of the populace.

Naturally the Left Front has so far been unable to take any major step to alter its record of non-performance, despite the near-frenzied internal demands to make immediate changes in its governmental functioning. "We have to make policy changes and drop inefficient ministers if necessary," feels a Forward Bloc leader lamenting the CPI(M) inaction in such matters. So far the only concrete step taken by the state Government is a "special three-month drive" to clean up Calcutta. Orchestrated amidst much fanfare by the CPI(M) Urban Affairs Minister Prasanta Sur, this drive aims to provide the basic minimum civic services that the Calcutta Municipal Corporation is normally supposed to do.

As for the Congress(I), its state leaders admit that for the time being the

Why was ESPL the first to bring UNIX based 8-bit and 16-bit computers to India ?

Why was ESPL the first to bring Motorola 68000 microprocessor based computer — Super MICRO 32 — to India ?

Why was ESPL the first to bring Distributed Processing based Data Acquisition Systems (DAS) to India ?

Why does ESPL have a collaboration for DAS with WESTINGHOUSE ELECTRIC CORPORATION, the world leaders in instrumentation ?

Why is ESPL developing microprocessor based Agro Dairy Instruments for the first time in India under a UNDP aided project ?

For no reason but one ....

ESPL believes in giving the best to users

The best in terms of technology. The best in terms of products. The best in terms of support services.

That is why ESPL computers were the first to be recommended by the Ministry of Education.

And right after its introduction, ESPL Super MICRO 32, a 16-bit system, became the automatic choice of more than 60 organisations that include IITs, Regional Engineering Colleges, Universities, other Technical and Educational institutes, Government and Commercial enterprises. As many as 30 systems have already been installed within the short span of one year.

And ESPL, a relatively new company, received Rs. 11 crore worth of orders during the first year of operations alone.

What's more, ESPL has once again taken the lead in technology by introducing three new products — a powerful personal computer, a wordprocessor and a small 16-bit system ..... all at very affordable prices in keeping with the Government's aim to popularise the use of computers.

Centre's man in West Bengal is Asoke Sen, whose piloting of the anti-defection bill is read as a sign of his importance. All the same, they are convinced that Sen is a "passing phase" and an unlikely candidate for commanding the volatile state unit of the party.

Sen, on the other hand, has made his desire to come back as undisputed Congress(I) leader in West Bengal quite clear. Returning from New Delhi after the Parliament session, Sen summoned a WBPCC(I) meeting for the express purpose of passing a resolution urging for the "immediate" reconstitution of the committee. The PCC(I) has been practically defunct for the past couple of years and its reconstitution is going to be significant. Sadhan Pande, a Congress(I) candidate for the Bustolla assembly by-elections says: "The high command now wants to form a pradesh committee that will be projected as an alternative to the Jyoti Basu ministry." The new PCC(I) president, in other words, will be the Congress(I)'s prospective chief minister.

At present, there are three likely contenders for the coveted post: Sen, Ajit Panja and to a lesser extent, Priya Ranjan Das Munshi. However, most Congressmen, including Sen, do not think that Das Munshi can or should be inducted at that level. "Das Munshi will have to accept whatever position the high command gives him," Asoke Sen told INDIA TODAY.

Ajit Panja also is reportedly not keen to become WBPCC(I) chief, especially considering that his past record in that post had not been inspiring. Even Sen is not quite sure where he stands. His complaints against Congress(I) leaders who had allegedly worked against party candidates in the recent parliamentary elections has not elicited any response from the party high command.

Not only will the state Congress(I) have to refurbish its internal organisation but, as Asoke Sen says, it will ultimately have to project "a clean and efficient alternative to the Left Front". For the Left Front too the task is twofold: internal dissensions have to be submerged and then it will have to prove to the electorate capable of providing a government that works.

Obviously, the equations that dominated West Bengal politics for the past seven years are rapidly crumbling and the situation is now so different that the party that can shrug off its inertia and adjust fastest has the best future.

Plugging the Leak

PATIENCE and perseverance sometimes do pay. On February 1, the 220 MW unit-1 of the Rajasthan Atomic Power Project (RAPP) at Rawatbhata, 62 km from Kota, went back into operation after 1,060 days or nearly three years. The reason for the unprecedented shutdown had been the leakage of water from two tiny cracks in the south end shield enclosing the calandria, the heart of the pressurised heavy water reactor (PHWR). The restarting of the plant laid to rest all fears that the plant was going to be scrapped because the Department of Atomic Energy (DAE) was unable to plug the leak (INDIA TODAY, April 15, 1984). Clearly pleased by the success of nearly 3 years' endless attempts to plug the leaks, G.V. Nadkarni, chief superintendent of the project said: "The long period required to get the problem right made people wonder about the unit's future. But ultimately we have been able to get it going."

The leak was first spotted on September 20, 1981 and immediately pinpointed as from F-10, one of the 306 coolant tubes in the calandria— a cylinder 20 ft long and 17 ft in diameter. According to the PHWR process, each coolant channel holds 12 bundles of natural uranium, which undergoes fission to generate heat which in turn heats the heavy water coursing over the coolant tubes. This in turn heats ordinary water that evaporates into steam which moves the turbines, thus generating power. Enclosing the calandria are 4 ft wide "end shields" which support the weight of the coolant tube assemblies and act as shields to keep radioactivity in. Ordinary water is circulated through the end shields to keep them cool. It was this water contaminated by radioactivity which was leaking from the south end shield.

The first attempt to plug the leak was a chemical process advocated by BARC scientists, and involved sealing the crack with zinc polysilicate. The unit resumed functioning on January 28, 1982 but was shut down a month later on March 4 because the leak reappeared.

The leaking end shield (top) and repairs in progress: commendable work

For the next 19 months scientists worked on the assumption that the snag lay in tube F-10 alone. The problem was complicated greatly by the fact that the men working on the repairs could face intense radioactivity: in 15 minutes a worker would absorb as much radiation as he could normally take safely over three months. "Therefore," says Nadkarni," we had to work out the procedure to the last detail so that nobody had to stay a minute longer than necessary."

Every step taken also had to be approved by the RAPP Safety Committee, the DAE Safety Review Committee and the Atomic Energy Regulatory Board (AERB). This was essential because it was not clearly known to what extent the continuous neutron radiation, for over eight years since the unit went commercial in end 1973, had affected the end shield. Presumably, the material had lost some ductility and become somewhat brittle, so that still greater care had to be exercised before working on it.

In September 1982, the F-10 coolant channel was cut but the next major step came only a year later. The coolant tube is held in the end shield in another tube called the lattice tube and its cutting took place only in September 1983 by an improvised process which is called the spark erosion method.

A detailed inspection showed that there were two cracks—both 1.5 mm wide—on the inside face of the end shield facing the calandria, running from lattice tube F-10 to lattice tubes F-9 and E-10. The first was 38.5 mm long and the other 58 mm.

In the course of 1984, the coolant channels and lattice tubes of F-9 and E-10 were cut. A decision was made to plug the three channels, even though it would reduce the power generation capacity of the reactor by about 2 per cent. Special plugs—made of 3.5 per cent nickle steel—were designed by the Reactor Component Group of the Bombay Nuclear Power Board's Engineering Design Division. The plugs were installed in mid-December last year and the effectiveness of the plugging was tested for a month with cold and hot water circulation and found to be safe. Last fortnight RAPP-1 finally began operations at a generation capacity of 60 MW.

Though the leak has been successfully dealt with, the cracks have not been eliminated. Nadkarni admits that they have only been sealed within a metal gasket. And three years later no one has any reasons for why the cracks appeared and whether this problem could occur elsewhere in the end shields. For the moment however, restarting the plant in spite of having dealt with a problem never dealt with before is achievement enough.

DHOLPUR

Crying Shame

THESE were the ones that didn't get away. Nearly three years after blinding 13 innocent villagers (INDIA TODAY, July 31, 1982) at a fake eye camp in Rajakhera, 35 km from the district headquarters of Dholpur, Ramesh Chandra, Mahesh Chandra and Munnalal were given a stiff 18 years' imprisonment each by Chief Judicial Magistrate Mathura Prasad Paliwal late December. Charged by the district police with causing grievous hurt by a dangerous weapon, extorting money, cheating and entering into a criminal conspiracy, the break-up was six years on each of the three counts, the sentences to run consecutively. Two others, Babu Lal and Radhey Lal, accused of publicising the camp, were acquitted for want of evidence.

Much in the manner of undetected quacks operating in various parts of the country, the young men armed with an old dissection box comprising forceps, rusted knife, bits of shaving blade and barber's razor, needle and thread, syringes and some medicines, set up their camp at Rajakhera on March 20, 1982. According to evidence in court, they made the patients, mostly elderly, pay Rs 21 each for admission into the camp. Using chloroform in quite a few instances, they then pierced their patients' eyes with a sharp instrument, and bandaged them up, refusing to continue 'treatment' until the unsuspecting soul paid up a further sum.

M.P. Paliwal

The extent of the damage caused to the villagers can be gauged by a report made by the then surgeon of the Dholpur district hospital, Chandra Shekhar Arora, on the victims which states: "Ram Devi, 62, left eye—gaping wound in upper part of the cornea and iris... blood presenting in section... upper half of cornea hazy... no useful vision; Hanuman Das, 50, right eye—irregular section of cornea in upper part... lens matter visible through pupil... only perception of light... no useful vision; Shyama, 80, right eye—anterior chamber is formed and vaseline particle floating in it. Some lens matter present in pupilary area... no useful vision."

The instruments used at the camps

SREEKANT KHANDEKAR

The irony was that although the police was aware of the camp, they got into the act late because nobody had lodged a complaint. In court their lawyer argued that his clients had been falsely implicated, that the identification by the witnesses was inadequate, that they be treated leniently considering their youth, that they had had no police record and had already spent nearly three years in jail. But Paliwal was unimpressed. "In such a matter, only a stiff punishment would be appropriate," he said.

Still, the damage is done, and is further highlighted by the fact that this unscrupulous trio had held about three dozen camps in which more than a thousand persons were 'treated'. They also face similar charges in the Alwar district court. But, considering the nature of their wanton misdeeds, no punishment would be harsh enough.

ANDHRA PRADESH

Repression of Rights

BEING released on bail is no guarantee of even temporary freedom in Andhra Pradesh these days. This was brought home rather forcefully to Andhra Pradesh Civil Liberties Committee (APCLC) Secretary K. Balagopal last fortnight. No sooner did he step beyond the massive gates of the Central Jail in Warangal than he was rearrested by waiting policemen and deposited in a police lock-up while further charges of attempted murder and arson against him were investigated. In what has developed into a running battle between the police and supporters of radicals and Naxalites, rearresting those released on bail seems to have become a favourite ploy of the police.

But for Balagopal, the waiting policemen were no surprise. During his detention he had told INDIA TODAY of this police habit of subverting the law in order to harass and intimidate individuals for their political beliefs. But never in the past have civil liberties activists themselves been targets of the police as during the present crackdown.

The police have their own reasons for being angry with the APCLC. In the past decade its activists have frequently exposed police atrocities. Last year alone they brought to light 24 deaths and six cases of rape in police custody. But the police offensive against them gained in intensity after APCLC activists accused the police of killing K. Sudarshan, 19, and K. Sarangapani, 23, in separate incidents in Warangal. Both were members of the radical youth league which supports the Kondapalli Seetharamaiah faction of the Naxalites.

Whether the police campaign against the APCLC activists has the approval of the Chief Minister N.T. Rama Rao is unknown. But he is certainly peeved with the Naxalites, some are believed to be backing M.V. Ramana Reddy, who has launched the Rayalaseema Vimochana Samiti to contest the Assembly elections from the parched Rayalaseema region. The APCLC is more inclined to view the police offensive against it as an extension of the police drive against Naxalite sympathisers and a bid to scuttle investigations into police atrocities.

But Warangal District Police Superintendent K. Arvind Rao counters these allegations, saying: "The APCLC preaches violence and Balagopal has done it even in my presence. We have to check violent acts by any group." He is unconvinced that they are fighting for the rights of the poor, and says that if cases of minimum wages not being paid to labourers are brought to his notice, he is prepared to take remedial action "But", he argues, "we have to take stern action when the law is violated."

APCLC President G. Kannabiran, however, discounts the police chief's words and accuses him of being politically biased. "He has scant respect for the Constitution and is responsible for all the extra-legal activities of the Warangal police." Indeed, the police in Warangal do have an inglorious record, including parading Naxalite sympathisers in the nude. Admitting that several colleagues indulged in barbaric acts, one police officer says: "A political force like the Naxalites is being countered by the police force. This is not right. As long as we are asked to fight them as a law and order problem they will grow stronger and the police will lose credibility."

Meanwhile, social scientist Rajni Kothari has appealed to Rama Rao to intervene and order the release of the unlawfully detained civil liberties activists. The case against Balagopal and other APCLC activists including Telugu poet Varavara Rao, paediatrician and APCLC vice-president Ramanathan and college lecturer P. Seetharam Rao is that they had planned the January 18 attack on the house of circle inspector Ramachandra Rao by the radicals, ostensibly to herald the start of a bandh that day to protest against Sudarshan's killing.

Sarangapani, who was killed later, had taken part in the attack. Forensic experts gave out few details after their post-mortem on Sarangapani's body, and Arvind Rao maintains that he died of exhaustion when chased by the police. But his mother Radha who lives in the local Azam Jahi Mills quarters laments: "The police did not allow me even to bathe the body but did the cremation themselves and stayed there till the body was reduced to ashes."

As for Sudarshan, the district police say he is still absconding but the APCLC alleges a local police officer was responsible for his killing and cremation. District Collector R.P. Singh has ordered an inquiry into the incident. The police are also worried by the growing sympathy for the Naxalites among the farm workers and students. Police camps have been set up in some villages and in the local Kakatiya University. A petition for their removal is now before the Supreme Court. Whatever the verdict, the strife between the civil libertarians and radicals on one side and the police on the other may take an uglier turn before the March 5 assembly elections.

ASSEMBLY ELECTIONS

An Unequal Battle

IT WAS the night of the long knives, a political massacre more thorough than heralded by the Lok Sabha poll, a cleansing of the ranks that had been hinted at often enough but which few believed would ever come about. And, in the process not only was the ruling party poised on the edge of a transformation, it was truly at the start of a Rajiv Gandhi era. As the prime minister's Parliamentary Secretary, Arun Singh, said: "We've taken the first step. It's the right step, whether it is politically sagacious or not. Let's see what happens. We've done what we promised."

The promise that Singh was referring to was Rajiv's vow repeated time and again in the past three months, particularly at election time last December, to restore integrity to politics, fight corruption and project a clean party image. The step that he talked about was more of a leap. Last fortnight when the Congress(I) Parliamentary Board (CPB) finalised its list of candidates for 2,534 assembly seats in the 11 states and one Union territory that go to the polls next month to elect new legislatures, it had axed no fewer than 40 per cent of its sitting MLA's and replaced them with younger, often unknown and untried but fresh faces. In a bold move, it dropped no fewer than 63 ministers from the outgoing state governments. So sweeping was the clean-up that even so staid a person as the party's Working President Kamalapati Tripathi, who had protested against some of the changes made in the Lok Sabha lists, was moved to say: "The Congress party has been rejuvenated after Mrs Gandhi's martyrdom."

Revitalised or not, only the election would show. But there was no doubt that given the massive mandate earned in the Lok Sabha election and the fractured state of the opposition parties, the upcoming contest was already set to be an unequal one. Nobody was quicker off the mark in launching the campaign than the tireless prime minister who hit the campaign trail on February 10 in a gruelling tour de force of Uttar Pradesh.

In contrast, the opposition parties were slow to get cracking, demoralised as they were by their drubbing in December. Banking on the charisma of a few leaders and on the performance of the Telugu Desam in Andhra Pradesh and the Janata Party in Karnataka, they had precious little to offer other than the sure knowledge that historically, state elections have always turned in poorer results for ruling parties than Lok Sabha polls have done (page 67).

But clearly they had only a patchy success where it mattered most: in avoiding multi-cornered contests that tend to cripple the Opposition to the advantage of the Congress(I). Unity eluded them in the major states such as Madhya Pradesh, Uttar Pradesh, Karnataka and Gujarat though they were able to come to credible arrangements in Rajasthan, Maharashtra and Andhra Pradesh.

For the moment, however, it was not the Opposition which grabbed public attention but the ruling party which had just undergone the most thorough spring-cleaning in its history. That this was the handiwork of the prime minister was never much in doubt. The wave that carried the Congress(I) to its triumphant victory in the Lok Sabha poll was of Rajiv's creation, and there was no doubt that he was once again reaching out to the people over the heads of the party bosses and its local stalwarts—and the corrupt and ineffective who littered its ranks—to ask the electorate for a fresh mandate in what amounts to a mini-general election with some 280 million voters entitled to exercise their franchise. A newcomer to politics, Rajiv was not only presenting a new team of potential legislators to the people, he was also in the process seeking to rebuild the party from the grassroots.

To do this, Rajiv and his aides drew up a 10-point list of guidelines sent out to all the election committees set up in the states last month. Sitting party MLA's would be disqualified if they were of doubtful loyalty and integrity, if they were believed to be casteists or if the Congress(I) had lost their assembly segment in the last Lok Sabha election held in December.

Clearly, with some 250,000 applications pouring into party offices throughout the country, an average of almost 100 applications per seat being contested, fulfilling these criteria was going to be an uphill task. The task was performed at two levels: the Pradesh Congress(I) Committees were first asked to make a preliminary selection. They were aided by some 50-odd trusted MP's who helped recommend names to the CPB and who finally brought some 6,000 names to Delhi.

Then began the hard part. Along with the short list came legions of aspirants. From February 1 to 7, when the first list was finally made public, more than 50,000 ticket seekers camped in the capital, taking up every square inch of the state bhawans, spilling into the homes of friendly MP's, and company guest-houses and hotels. Some bhawans reported 10 occupants to a room, while a 50-member Karnataka Congress(I) team took over one entire floor of the Janpath Hotel. Said a harried party General Secretary, Sreekant Verma: "The Congress party has never received so many applications for assembly seats."

It wasn't just aspirants who descended on the capital. The rows of state government-owned planes parked on the apron at Palam indicated the shuttling presence of an array of chief ministers. While the leaders debated the lists, the aspirants did the rounds calling on anyone and everyone, dropping off their curriculum vitae neatly inscribed by electronic typewriter, some even roping in local journalists to put in a good word where they thought it mattered.

In the end, none of this paid dividends. Presided over by Rajiv, a tightly-knit team of selectors spent four days and nights working round the clock (the prime minister didn't go home for three nights) to make a final selection. And it was approprate to such an operation that the patient came to know of his fate in the stillness of the midnight hour. When the list was released in the early hours of February 8, it came as a shock to one and all. The unexpected was the clean-up. Maharashtra lost 125 of 215 Congress(I) MLA's, Himachal seven of 33, Orissa 50 of 117, Bihar 70 of 186, Andhra Pradesh 17 of 57, Karnataka 26 of 88, Rajasthan 70 of 149, Madhya Pradesh 77 of 230, Uttar Pradesh 153 of 306, and 81 of 142 in Gujarat.

True, all nine Congress(I) chief ministers had been awarded tickets. But if their opponents in the party had been asked, so had their supporters. Few of them had much to be cheerful about.

It was, after all, no real vote of confidence in them that their ministerial teams were so thoroughly stripped. The operation was thorough-going in all the states. While ministerial axings were not relevant in opposition-ruled Andhra Pradesh and Karnataka (see boxes), they cut at the very heart in the other states.

IN MAHARASHTRA, 13 ministers who were dropped included 11 who had signed a memorandum supporting former deputy chief minister Ramrao Adik when he was asked to resign following incidents of unruly behaviour on a visit to West Germany last year. Not only were Adik and the ineffective former chief minister Babasaheb Bhosale denied tickets, so were Chief Minister Vasantdada Patil's rivals Irrigation Minister Shivajirao Patil Nilangekar, Civil Supplies Minister Pratibha Patil and Energy Minister Baliram Hiray who flew to Delhi to make a vain protest. There was a lesson in Maharashtra for defectors: of the 40 former Congress(S) MLA's who switched loyalties with Y.B.Chavan in 1980, only nine were given tickets. Nor was there much leniency shown to some of the Central ministers: Chemicals Minister Vasant Sathe's nephew Arun Diwekar was denied a ticket as was an associate of Ghulam Nabi Azad, Azhar Hussain.

In Orissa, five of J.B.Patnaik's 15 ministerial colleagues failed to make the grade including Finance Minister Raghunath Patnaik who is facing corruption charges and Minister of State Kuanria Majhi, accused of rape. Out of the running were others in important party positions or at the head of state units, such as strongman Basant Biswal, a contractor-turned-Congress(I) treasurer who had been widely dubbed "super chief minister", Lalit Mohan Gandhi, dropped from the ministry three years ago after being convicted in a jeep theft case, state party General Secretary Baikuntha Swain and chairman of the State Housing Board, T. Samantaray. Said opposition leader Damodar Raut: "If anything, the list has confirmed our charge that the Patnaik government was dominated by thoroughly corrupt characters."

In Bihar, no fewer than seven ministers including four of cabinet rank, Ramasay Prasad Singh, Nagendra Jha, Jagnarain Trivedi and Buddhdeo Singh went by the board. Also out were speaker Radhanandan Jha and a majority of the followers of former chief minister Jagannath Mishra whose supporters urged him not to accept a nomination for himself. But this did not mean that Chief Minister Chandrashekhar Singh was pleased. In Delhi he had to fight hard for his own nomination and (often unsuccessfully) for many of his supporters, who as a result jeered him as well as the state party chief Bindeshwari Dubey. Said Singh meekly: "The list prepared by the high command is a balanced one. Only controversial party legislators have been denied tickets to give the party a clean image."

In Rajasthan, Chief Minister Shiv Charan Mathur found it difficult to jump with joy at the list. But equally unhappy were his rivals for the job, former chief ministers Jagannath Pahadia and Harideo Joshi. Mathur lost four cabinet colleagues among 11 ministers who didn't get tickets: Finance Minister Brij Sunder Sharma, Law Minister Ahmed Bux Sindhi, Social Welfare Minister Dularam and Health Minister Khet Singh Rathore. Nor could he have been overjoyed that three dissident ministers that he had dropped on charges of indiscipline, Narendra Singh Bhatti, Surendra Vyas and Hanuman Prabhakar, were awarded tickets.

In Madhya Pradesh, though the interests of both major factions in the state, led by Chief Minister Arjun Singh and former central minister Vidya Charan Shukla were accommodated, no fewer than seven of Singh's ministerial colleagues were dropped including Law Minister Krishna Paul Singh, Finance Minister Jhumak Lal Bhedia and Industry Minister Rajendra Jain. Claimed state party chief Moti Lal Vohra: "The high command chose each candidate on merit" explaining why only 153 sitting MLA's were nominated for the 320 seats the party is contesting.

In Himachal Pradesh, those axed included Revenue Minister Shiv Kumar Singh and Animal Husbandry Minister Daulat Ram Shankhayan, both defectors from the Janata Party in 1980 along with a number of others who came over from the Janata Party to enable former chief minister Ram Lal to form a ministry.

In Uttar Pradesh, no fewer than seven ministers and four general secretaries were denied tickets including Information Minister Abdul Rehman Nashtar, Parliamentary Affairs Minister Ram Singh Khanna, Urban Development Minister Vidya Bhushan and general secretaries Ammar Rizvi, Gulab Sehra and Baccha Pathak. Gone too is hijacker Bhola Pandey but retained is fellow hijacker Devendra Pandey.

In Gujarat, Solanki's cabinet of 17 was decimated with no fewer than 11 being dropped, a loud and clear message that he cannot take the Centre for granted. Axed were Home Minister Prabodh Rawal, Health Minister Kolila Vyas, Finance Minister Harihar Khamboljia and Social Welfare Minister Devji Vanvi. Solanki critics Sanat Mehta and Manoharsinh Jadeja fared no better. Faction leader Jinabhai Darji, executive director of the state's 20-point programme, failed to get his supporters tickets but was game enough to acknowledge: "We have fought to introduce morality in politics and to ensure justice to the poor. Now this seems to be coming around and in the process some of us will have to lose."

If those dropped from the Congress(I) lists were men and women of such importance, who came in to replace them? The answer for the most part was: young, fresh contestants. In state after state, the lists are dominated by young people, by Youth Congress or student activists or professionals. In Orissa, for example, 95 candidates were younger than 45 years and another 45 aged between 45 and 60. Only seven were older than 60. In Rajasthan, the pattern was similar with the added distinction that more than half the

The Safety Margin

IF THE Indian electorate didn't change its mind between Lok Sabha and state assembly elections, the Congress(I) would be sitting pretty with huge majorities in 10 of 11 states that will elect new assemblies on March 2 and 5, 1985. A detailed breakdown of the 1984 Lok Sabha results by assembly segments—each Lok Sabha seat generally contains between six and eight assembly seats—shows the overwhelming dominance of the Congress(I) in each state except Andhra Pradesh (see boxes). But, historically, the voting patterns in assembly elections has never been the same as in general elections and there are messages from the recent past that should make the Congress(I) all but complacent.

The Lok Sabha elections in 1977 and 1980 were followed closely by state assembly elections in a number of states. In both cases the party that won the Lok Sabha election did somewhat worse in the subsequent assembly elections. The trend was most significant in 1977 when the Janata Party won the general elections and, although it did well in the state assembly elections too, found that its vote percentage had dropped substantially (see table).

In 1980, the assembly elections were once again held within six months of the Lok Sabha elections. Although the Congress(I) held its own in a number of states there was still a clear swing away from the party, for instance in Bihar of 2.6 per cent, Gujarat 3.9 per cent, Maharashtra 8.8 per cent and Orissa 8.4 per cent. Uttar Pradesh proved to be an exception when it turned in a 2 per cent swing in favour of the Congress(I).

However, in the 1984 Lok Sabha elections, the margins of victory were so large in each assembly segment that similar, small swings away from the Congress(I) will have very little impact on the number of seats it should win. All that would happen in such circumstances is that the Congress(I) would retain the seats but with lower margins of victory.

A detailed study of all the assembly elections since 1967 and the Lok Sabha results analysed by assembly segment shows that the Congress has generally tended to do better at general elections than state assembly elections. This is probably because the Congress(I) is a national party and can capitalise the most on national issues. In assembly elections local issues become more important and the Congress(I) loses its relative advantage.

The most important issue in the 1984 Lok Sabha elections was the widespread anxiety over the unity of the country (INDIA TODAY, December 31, 1984 and January 15) which brought out sections of the electorate to vote who do not normally vote. For example, the exceptionally high turnout, especially of women, probably helped the Congress(I). The 1984 election result virtually closed the issue of unity with the huge mandate given to one party. In any case it is unlikely to be such an emotive issue with the voter in these assembly elections. Consequently, the Congress(I) must face the electorate without the most important factor that contributed to its recent landslide victory.

On the other hand, the new government has made a remarkably favourable impression in its first two months and this may tend to stem any swing away from the party. In fact, more than a swing away from the Congress(I) the factor that will work most against the party repeating its performance is the over-confidence and complacency of both the voter and, perhaps, the party worker. Expectations of any easy victory by the Congress(I) may keep many voters at home and a lower turnout than the 1984 general elections would tend to work against the Congress(I). The first warning signals of this occurring were given in the by-election or countermanded election results that were held on January 28.

The result from Chail, in Uttar Pradesh, show that the Congress(I) cannot be complacent. The average swing to the Congress(I) in Uttar Pradesh between 1980 and 1984 was a high 14.5 per cent but in the Chail election the swing over 1980 was less than half that at 6.1 per cent. Moreover, coupled with this diminished swing in favour of the Congress(I), the Opposition was much more united in Chail which resulted in the Congress(I) just scraping through with a narrow victory margin of 3,415 votes. The ruling party also needs to note that in Chail it lost in six of the seven assembly segments in the constituency.

Part of the explanation for the same swing in Chail must be the low turnout of 43.2 per cent which is much below the average turnout for the state of 54.8 per cent in the Lok Sabha poll. The lower turnout coupled with a smaller swing suggests that many over-confident Congress(I) voters stayed away.

Other elections held on January 28 in Kerala and Tamil Nadu also revealed setbacks for the Congress(I). In Tamil Nadu, where the Congress(I) and AIADMK had averaged about 60 per cent of the vote in the Lok Sabha election constituencies they fought, their vote dropped dramatically to around 45 per cent. This could have been temporary in the absence of Chief Minister MGR, but the reverses in Kerala were more significant and augur ill for the Congress(I) if they are indicative of the regional mood.

The result of the coutermanded election in Bhopal was an exception to the reverse swings. The swing in favour of the Congress(I) in Bhopal was 18.2 per cent, almost twice the state average swing of 9.8 per cent between 1980 and 1984. The marginally lower turnout here of 50.2 per cent compared to 55.6 in the 1984 and their position in this state seems increasingly invincible.

The Congress(I) is more likely to lose votes on account of its supporters not bothering to vote than switch in voter behaviour. This is because voter loyalties tend to last for periods longer than only a few weeks as it is difficult to rationalise a switch in such brief periods.

Consequently, in assembly elections the attributes of the candidate rather than the party tend to get emphasised and independents invariably get a much higher percentage of the vote. The elaborate and much-publicised exercise that the Congress party has undertaken in the selection of its candidates is likely to be a major point in its favour in the context of assembly elections. This, however, should be tempered with a finding repeatedly reported in opinion polls—the Congress voter tends to vote more for the party than the candidate while supporters of the opposition parties, especially the BJP vote more for the candidate than the party.

When one election follows so closely on the heels of another two conflicting trends emerge: the "bandwagon" effect versus the "sympathy for the underdog" effect. The bandwagon effect works on the innate preference of those voters who like to back a winner. It also attracts voters who feel that unless they vote for the obvious winner, in this instance the Congress(I), their vote would be wasted. On the other hand, a landslide victory in which the Opposition is decimated often evokes a feeling in the electorate that while the overall result was warranted, the extent of the victory was excessive. This sympathy for the loser is exaggerated in our kind of voting system which gives the winning party many more seats than the votes it receives—the Congress(I) won 80 per cent of the seats on the basis of just under 50 per cent of the votes.

The most obvious problem that the Congress(I) will face in the assembly elections is the mediocre portfolio of potential chief ministers that it has to offer. This legacy of the past will be sharply exposed in states where the Opposition has particularly strong contenders as chief minister: Hegde in Karnataka, Sharad Pawar in Maharasthra, Biju Patnaik in Orissa, Bhairon Singh Shekhawat in Rajasthan and, of course, N.T. Rama Rao in Andhra Pradesh. Against this, however, the continued disunity of the opposition parties will be a major advantage for the Congress(I). Even in those states where the Opposition has arrived at an agreement on seat adjustments, it is unlikely that they will have shed their image of disunity and the consequent fears of post-election internal bickering would cause a swing away from them. It is not enough to arrive merely at a technical seat adjustment—though this does help in the arithmetics of the electoral game—as long as perception of disunity persists.

In the final analysis, however, the overwhelming victory of the Congress(I) in the recent elections with large victory margins in the assembly segments would require a very major swing away for the picture to be changed substantially. Though such major swings are unlikely to occur in such a short span of time, the Opposition certainly has more and the Congress(I) less going for it in these assembly elections compared with the recent Lok Sabha elections.

candidates have never contested an election before. The state's list also boasts as many as 30 lawyers, doctors and engineers.

The new look Congress(I) is partial to women: typical of the new lists are 30 women candidates in Madhya Pradesh and 20 in Gujarat where party Secretary Hasmukh Patel said: "Last time, most of the candidates had not seen the corridors of a school. This time, practically all of us can read, write and speak."

Encouraging though this may be, it camouflages some of the more traditional values that have gone into candidate selection: caste. In Bihar, for example, the upper castes maintain their domination of the lists: of 324 Congress(I) candidates in the state, 40 per cent are upper caste comprising 52 Rajputs, 44 Brahmins and 34 Bhumihars. The so-called backwards number only 58. In Madhya Pradesh, the Brahmins and Thakurs walked away with 80 seats—25 per cent of the total—even though they comprise only 18 per cent of the population.

If such caution is understandable, less easy to explain are the ones that got away, candidates who ought to have been rejected by the criteria laid down but nevertheless scraped in. The exceptions abound—and dilute the overall impact of the party's new, clean look. In Himachal Pradesh, several ministers given tickets have corruption charges against them. In Madhya Pradesh, Rama Shankar Singh, president of the state unit of the Dalit Mazdoor Kisan Party (DMKP) till he defected last month has been given a ticket. In Bihar Raghunath Pandey from Muzaffarpur, a transport tycoon who has been controversial and defected to the Congress(I) after contesting the 1980 Lok Sabha election unsuccessfully as an independent has been given a ticket. So has Mala Devi from Fatwa who has an excise case and a warrant of arrest pending against her for alleged involvement in liquor rackets. And, so was Saghir Ahmed who was dropped from Mishra's cabinet three years ago for allegedly being involved in goat skin smuggling across the Nepal border. Party circles in Bihar are particularly sore that this should have happened when someone like Ramashray Prasad Singh, considered an effective and non-controversial parliamen-

1984	Lok Sabha	262	7	19
1980	Assembly	169	13	42
	Lok Sabha	169	53	39
1977	Assembly	57	214	—
	Lok Sabha	6	297	—

► An analysis of the 1984 Lok Sabha election shows the Congress(I) won in 262 of the state's 324 assembly segments on average with a margin of 19 per cent.

► Surprisingly, the party won exactly the same number of assembly segments in both the Lok Sabha and assembly elections in 1980—unlike the Janata Party which lost ground between the 1977 Lok Sabha elections and the assembly poll that year when its tally dropped from 297 to 214.

► The Congress(I) is relatively secure, and it would require a 10 per cent swing away from it for it to lose its hold on the assembly. But Bihar is sensitive to swings: a 1 per cent swing costs 10 seats in the assembly.

	Lok Sabha	152	30	—
1977	Assembly	79	103	—
1975	Lok Sabha	75	56	18

► If everyone in the forthcoming assembly elections votes in exactly the same way as in the 1984 Lok Sabha election, the Congress(I) would win 140 out of 182 seats.

► However, in earlier elections the electorate did not vote in the same way in the two elections and in 1980 there was a swing away from the Congress(I) of 4 per cent after the Lok Sabha elections and its tally in the assembly constituencies dropped from 152 to 141.

► The Congress(I) stands to lose its majority in the Vidhan Sabha only if there is a substantial swing of 7 per cent against it since last December, provided the opposition remains as united as it was in the Lok Sabha elections.

1977	Assembly	84	230	—

► The Congress(I) appears to be very safe, going by the Lok Sabha results and the recent Bhopal election. Of 320 assembly segments, the ruling party lost in only 13.

► It would require a massive swing of 17 per cent away from the Congress(I) for it to lose its overwhelming majority in the Vidhan Sabha.

► Moreover, unlike in most other states, the Congress(I) did not lose ground between the 1980 Lok Sabha and assembly elections — unlike the Janata Party which had slipped considerably between the 1977 Lok Sabha and assembly elections.

► The results of the Lok Sabha election last December showed that the Congress(I) won in 222 of 288 assembly segments.

► Only a massive swing of 12 per cent away from the Congress(I)'s Lok Sabha vote would enable the Opposition to form a government in Maharashtra, and even then provided it is more united than it was in the last election.

► In 1980, the Congress(I) lost considerable ground in the months between the Lok Sabha election and the assembly poll in as many as 49 assembly segments.

► The ruling party can be shaken in this state only by a huge 13 per cent swing away from it.

► On past record, this is extremely unlikely: the Congress(I) has steadily improved its position with every election since its nadir in 1977 when it won in only 13 assembly segments. Its opponents have, on the other hand, steadily lost ground.

tary affairs minister, was denied a ticket. Dropped minister Raghunath Jha went so far as to charge: "All those involved in sex-scandals, smuggling and booth-capturing have been given tickets, the defectors have been rewarded and the list is loaded with close relatives of the leaders."

Jha's may be a case of sour grapes, but he was on the ball with his accusation about relatives. In one state after another, a close scrutiny of the lists shows how influential politicians have managed to get their relatives nominated. Worse, the party seems to have given with its left hand what its right has taken: scores of sitting MLA's and ministers dropped have been consoled by the nomination of their relatives to the lists. Among them:

► Orissa: Deputy Speaker Himanshu Shekhar Padhi has been replaced by his son Sujit while Chairman of the Agro Industries Corporation K.I. Kartikeswer Patra, has been replaced by his wife Uma Rani.

► Bihar: Speaker Radhanandan Jha was replaced by his son, Harkhu; Education minister Nagendra Jha by his son, Madan Mohan; Minister of State for Rural Reconstruction Kamneshwar by his brother Mithileshwar. Relatives of other politicians who have made the grade include: former minister Ramesh Jha's brother Satish Chandra, MP Manoj Pandey's mother, Kamla, and MP Prabhavati Gupta's husband, Rajendra.

► Madhya Pradesh: Finance Minister Bhedia was denied a ticket but his wife Saz was given Durg. Relatives of former chief minister D.P. Mishra, and politicians such as Bhagwat Rao Mandloi, Leila Dhar Joshi and Takhat Mal Jain have been given tickets, as have Andhra Pradesh Governor, S.D. Sharma's wife Vimla, and the relatives of a number of princely families including Pushp Raj Singh, son of MP Martand Singh of Rewa, Rashmi Devi, sister-in-law of MP Shivendra Bahadur Singh of Khairagarh and Rajawarelhas Singh scion of the former Narsingharh ruling family.

► Uttar Pradesh: Party secretaries Sehra and Pathak were denied tickets, but some of their relatives weren't. Other relatives to make the grade included Rewena Kumari, daughter of MLC Indira Mohini, Izhar Alim Khan, nephew of Central Minister of State for External Affairs, Khurshid Alam Khan, and Imran Kidwai, brother of Union Minister for Health and Family Welfare, Mohsina Kidwai.

► Gujarat: Tickets have been given to the wives of Jadeja, the health minister, Harihar Khamboljia minister of state for finance, and Jaswant Chauhan, south Gujarat Congress leader, all of whom were denied tickets.

This unprecedented intrusion of kinsmanship in the elections was, of course, a sop to keep disappointed MLA's and ministers in line, and curb potential rebel activity. The high command seems to have adopted a two part strategy in coping with this problem. First, it agreed to make modest changes in its list. After that it moved swiftly to act against those who persisted. That the selection of candidates took by surprise even some of those known to be close to the high com-

The tradition of great American ideas continues with FISHER.

Throughout its history, America has continued to give the world exciting, innovative technology.

In 1937, an American named Avery Fisher invented the world's first high fidelity sound system. Today, Fisher is still a leader in its field. Fisher audio components dominate 40% of the U.S. market. Fisher Audio Visual Systems combine a Hi-Fi VCR, a monitor TV with RGB input, 100 watt-plus sound amplifier and digitalized speaker systems and matching Compact Disc digital audio players to perfectly meet the needs of the "audio-visual age".

With Fisher's advanced electronics knowhow and superior audio/video quality control procedures, you are assured of superior performance with any Fisher audio or video product you select. Fisher. Another great American idea.

mand was evident when Minister of State for Railways, Madhavrao Scindia, intervened with the prime minister on behalf of rejected applicants from the Gwalior region.

Indeed, the protest took strange forms. In Bihar, Jagannath Mishra and his associates declined to vote in the Rajya Sabha election on February 7. In Madhya Pradesh, three towns in Chhindwara district observed a strike in protest against the denial of tickets to the sitting MLA's.

In some cases, the list was indeed changed. On one particular day, Vishwanath Pratap Singh flew to Lucknow twice to calm protesters and, as was the case in some other states like Madhya Pradesh and Rajasthan, was able to push through some marginal changes. Said Singh: "These changes have been done purely to ensure victory. Moreover we want to make it very clear that all those denied tickets are not unnecessarily unclean." Holding out a further sop to them, he added that some of those dropped would be accommodated in organisational positions after the election.

The timing of this was, clearly, the key for the high command was obviously watching to see where the loyalty lay of those it had so unceremoniously sliced from its legislative wings. Some of them resigned right away, like a former ministerial colleague of Antulay, Satish Chaturvedi and Naresh Pugalia from Maharashtra. In Himachal Pradesh, over a dozen rebels filed their nominations as independents, including former revenue minister Shiv Kumar and the state party general secretary Vidya Dhar. In Bihar, Raghunath Jha and 20 MLA's did the same while in Gujarat two former ministers, deputy revenue minister Mohammed Hussain Baloch and deputy prohibition minister Lalit Parmar resigned from the party.

While the indications were immediately not so clear, and the high command was waiting to see how far the revolt would persist, there was also evidence that the party had done all it intended to by way of appeasement and would come down hard on the rest, armed as it is with the anti-defection bill. Said Himachal Pradesh Chief Minister Virbhadra Singh, clearly echoing party policy: "All of them will ultimately fall in line, otherwise they have no place in the Congress(I)."

If the Congress(I) had its tremors of tension on account of these incipient revolts here and there, its problems paled in comparison with what the opposition parties were going through. Apart from Andhra Pradesh (page 74) and Karnataka (page 72), there seemed little effective fight left in the non-Congress(I) camp for the campaign. The opposition parties are focussing on local issues. In Himachal, for instance, Haryana Chief Minister Bhajan Lal's suggestion for the merger of Punjab, Haryana and Himachal Pradesh, has become a campaign issue and the state Congress(I) has been obliged to veto the idea.

The opposition parties will also focus their attack on those chief ministers, Gujarat's Solanki, Orissa's Patnaik and Madhya Pradesh's Arjun Singh, who have lasted their full term of five years but have been unable to provide effective or clean administration. Indeed, the Congress(I)'s clean sweep of so many ministers is grist to the Opposition mill, but they will be on less sure ground when it comes to fighting on a plank of a strong and unified opposition.

The painful fact is that the opposition parties are going to the polls in little better shape than they were in the Lok Sabha election. In part, this is due to the demoralisation that hit the national opposition parties after their Lok Sabha rout. And, in part it is their inability to come to terms with one another yet again, except in some key states where they may gain some of the ground they lost last December.

The villain of the piece was the inability of the Janata Party and BJP to come to an understanding. In Karnataka, their once close relationship lies in a shambles, and state level leaders were unable to work things out in both Gujarat and Madhya Pradesh. Where agreement did come, as in Maharashtra and Rajasthan, it was largely due to the ability of former chief ministers Sharad Pawar and Bhairon Singh Shekhawat to carry the main parties with them. Said Shekhawat: "Opposition unity is not a topic of discussion in the media; it must be shown in the field."

Where they did work, arrangements among the opposition parties were the result of dominant parties conceding ground to less powerful groups. In Himachal Pradesh, for example, the BJP's former chief minister, Shanta Kumar, conceded five seats to the DMKP and six to the Janata Party even though in the outgoing assembly the former had none and the latter only two. This obliged the Congress(I), which had a mere four seat majority in the house of 68, to take the opposition challenge a little more seriously, and Kumar declared: "We will not let the Congress(I) walk away with a landslide victory this time."

► As a rare exception to the general rule which shows that the ruling party loses ground between a Lok Sabha poll and an assembly election some months later, the Congress(I) actually improved its tally in 1980 from 222 to 309 assembly segments due to a small swing of 2 per cent in its favour and a sharp deterioration in opposition unity.

► The DMKP, on the other hand, has suffered a sharp reverse since the 1980 Lok Sabha election when, contesting as the Lok Dal, it held 165 assembly segments, falling to 59 in the assembly poll and 33 in last December's Lok Sabha poll.

In Maharashtra, the opposition parties united behind Pawar as the accepted leader of the Progressive Democratic Front. The Front, comprising the BJP, Janata, Peasants and Workers Party (PWP) and the Congress(S) has succeeded in creating an upbeat sense of mission, and was greeted by a crowd of several tens of thousands when Pawar, Atal Behari Vajpayee and Madhu Dandavate shared a Shivaji Park platform last fortnight.

Pawar's campaign scheme is shrewd: he praises some of Rajiv Gandhi's innovations and policies while attacking the state Government. "I want to give back Maharashtra its lost prestige," he says pointing out that there have been three chief ministers, constant infighting and several bloody riots in the last five years.

The state that made surprising news was Rajasthan where for the first time the BJP, DMKP and the Janata arrived at an oral understanding by which the BJP would contest 110 seats, the DMKP 60 and the Janata Party 30. Said BJP state president Hari Shankar Bhabhra: "We were determined to reach an understanding, because if the Janata Party had not been accommodated, it would have vitiated the atmosphere." Added the DMKP's 71-year-old Kumbha Ram Arya: "The parliamentary poll results have been a lesson: the people clearly want us to put up a united front, and we are going to do exactly that."

Elsewhere, the opposition front was as fragmented as always, and it seemed to be because of the absence of any formidable leader who could pull the flock behind him as in Maharashtra for instance where Pawar is deliberately being projected as chief minister. Congress(S) Rajya Sabha member, Suresh Kalmadi, says: "The Congress won the election by projecting a young prime minister in the Lok Sabha poll, we are now giving a young chief minister to replace an old chief minister."

Shekhawat in Rajasthan and N.T. Rama Rao in Andhra Pradesh are other obvious pillars of the Opposition, and it is in states which lack such figureheads that the problems have been at their most acute. In the absence of men such as these, there's been no one to whip the Opposition into shape or make magnanimous gestures of accommodation so necessary for political compromise.

In Orissa, the state of the Opposition is a cause of hope in the Congress(I) camp. The Janata Party is contesting 130 seats, the BJP 137, Nandini Sathpathy's Jagrat

KARNATAKA

The Hegde Factor

KARNATAKA Chief Minister Ramakrishna Hegde has started taking brisk early morning walks in an attempt to reduce weight. By last fortnight, however, that seemed to be the very least of his problems. After the massive jolt his Janata Government received in the December elections, the party's prospects of retrieving lost ground in the March assembly elections have further deteriorated after it failed to reach an understanding with its alliance partner, the BJP.

There was, however, some consolation for Hegde in the fact that his main rival, the Congress(I) had also run into a political headwind after the high command decided to drop many party heavyweights including the burly Gundu Rao and H.C. Srikantaiah, a former minister, and instead opt for people with a "clean image, loyal to the party, and hardworking". Thus, only 62 of the 88 sitting MLA's found berths while as many as 57 new faces appeared on the Karnataka political scene.

Political observers view the dumping of former chief minister Gundu Rao as well-planned strategy. According to their interpretation, it is wiser to avoid any undue comparisons on the part of the electorate with Gundu Rao's stormy three years in office and the relatively placid Hegde rule. Even Hegde grudgingly admitted that "by keeping Gundu out, Rajiv has effectively removed one of our main targets for attack". But in the process, the party high command has alienated many senior politicians who see themselves being replaced by unknown upstarts. Says one, S. Sivappa, former chairman of the Legislative Council: "In India, people respect their elders. It is going to be counter-productive for the party to have humbled us in this fashion".

But there could be an element of sour grapes in their claims. Among those dropped was Manik Rao Patil, former food minister who faces charges of illegally allotting cement to certain builders when he was in power. Srikantaiah, another minister in the Gundu Rao cabinet, is known as the king of the defectors for his role in helping Rao form the government in 1980 by inducing 80 Congress(U) and Janata MLA's to defect with him. He has also been a rabid dissident and is in the process of clawing his way back into power.

Another disgruntled leader is C.K. Jaffer Sharief, MP and former Union minister of state, who has threatened to resign from the party. Sharief is upset that none of his nominees was chosen for the four assembly constituencies that make up the Bangalore North Lok Sabha constituency which he represents. Although Sharief does not wield much clout among the Muslims his dissidence has assumed importance because the Muslim League which supported the Congress(I) in the Lok Sabha elections is reportedly fielding 20 candidates as independents for the assembly poll. This is likely to result in a split in the Muslim votes and with Sharief's disenchantment, the Muslim vote for the Congress(I) could be badly affected.

But that still does not explain the inclusion of the controversial S. Bangarappa, the former Kranti Ranga president who rejoined the Congress(I) only recently. Bangarappa was an outspoken critic of Mrs Gandhi and teamed up with the Janata Party to defeat the Congress(I) in the last assembly elections. Another aberration is the inclusion of Veerappa Moily, former leader of the opposition in the Assembly who was embarrassingly exposed by Hegde in an alleged bid to bribe an MLA with Rs 2 lakh to defect.

The Congress(I) has, however, taken careful considerations of caste and community. As many as 66 backward class and 35 Scheduled Caste candidates have been given tickets, almost half the total of 224 candidates put up by the party. The prominence to the weaker sections is an obvious counter to the Janata Party which is often accused of being dominated by the upper castes. Youth has also been a major consideration: 123 of the 224 candidates are below 45 and only seven are above 60. The party is also boasting about the fact that at least 50 candidates are professionals, mainly doctors, engineers and executives.

In its hurry to refurbish its image in the state, the Congress (I) has chosen to keep the prickly leadership issue in abeyance for the time being. Partymen only acknowledge that Moily and K.H. Patil have emerged all-powerful in the allocation of tickets. Says Patil diplomatically: "The present selection is not made on the basis of group politics. We all belong to only one group, Rajiv Gandhi's group."

However indications are that if the Congress(I) wins, neither Patil nor Moily will be given the top job which could instead, go to a dark horse. The active former Union minister, Digvijay Singh hinted at this when he said: "Who was Devraj Urs when Mrs Gandhi chose him to head the state and see how he grew after that."

If the Congress(I)'s selection has been adventurous, the Janata Party has chosen to play safe. Renominating all but a handful of its 93 sitting MLA's, the party's criteria for candidates was confined to the traditional caste and community factors. Candidates from the two dominant communities in the state, the Lingayats and the Vokkaligas, cornered more than half the 200 seats. Says party General Secretary J.H. Patel: "We admit that the emphasis is on the major communities which we consider as our vote banks. We are being realistic because we must win." Adds Hegde: "Only if we have a national leader of the stature of Mrs Gandhi can we cut across caste factors. Till then we cannot afford to take a risk." Hegde ran into trouble too in the selection of candidates and three of his cabinet ministers S. Revanna, R.N. Lakshmipathy and Vaijanath Patil threatened to resign protesting that their nominees had been ignored.

But the party's biggest setback has been in its negotiations with the BJP. Even before the negotiations started, a large section of the party led by Patel opposed the move. Hegde, however, reasoned that it would be ungrateful to ditch the BJP specially after it had helped prop up his government. But the BJP insisted on demanding 40 seats even though it had only 18 MLA's in the previous assembly. After much unseemly haggling, the figure was reduced to 32 but even that was more than the Janata was willing to concede and the talks finally collapsed. The split in votes is likely to affect the Janata Party's prospects in at least 30 constituencies.

Saddled with that disadvantage, the Janata Party is now banking on Hegde's charisma and his government's performance to see it through. Hegde is obviously going to be the key campaigner and has taken a leaf out of his neighbour N.T. Rama Rao's book by hiring an air-conditioned van with a hatch from where he can address public meetings. Hegde has called his vehicle 'Jaya Vahini' which means 'Vehicle of Victory' and exudes confidence. "We are still fighting fit. The people want my government. They have already decided to vote for us. The emphasis would be on continuity rather than change." That last line, however, has a suspiciously familiar ring.

► Although the Congress(I) won in 174 of the state's 224 assembly segments in the Lok Sabha election last December, it is precariously poised because of the Janata challenge.

► Had the non-Congress parties managed to remain united, with an index of opposition unity the same as it was in 1980, the Janata-led opposition would retain its hold on the state government if there is a small swing of only four per cent away from the Congress(I) in comparison with the December vote.

► But, with the BJP breaking away from the alliance, the Janata Party needs a somewhat larger swing, of seven per cent, to continue in power in the state.

A. PRABHAKAR RAO

NTR's pilot truck announcing his arrival: electoral innovations

ANDHRA PRADESH

A Triangular Test

POLITICS is never a dull affair in Andhra Pradesh, and the coming assembly elections in the state have already produced their share of unexpected twists and turns. For one thing, there was the startling refusal by 22 Congress(I) candidates to file their nomination papers at a time when the party was being besieged by an unprecedented 2.5 lakh ticket-seekers from across the country. Even more significant, the bashful non-candidates included the leader of the party in the dissolved assembly, A. Madan Mohan, the son of former chief minister J.Vengal Rao, J.Prasad Rao, and the zilla panchayat chief of Krishna district P. Koteswara Rao.

Then, there was the equally embarrassing sight of Chief Minister N.T. Rama Rao running scared and filing his nomination papers from three constituencies: his 1983 assembly base of Gudivada in Krishna district plus the Nalgonda town seat in Telengana and Hindupur in Rayalaseema. Clearly, NTR was unsure of repeating his 1983 assembly win from Gudivada, which gave the Congress(I) a majority in the December parliamentary poll, and felt the need for stepney constituencies.

If that reflected poorly on the Telugu Desam at a time when it was expected to sweep the polls, there was also the somewhat hapless sight of Nadendla Bhaskara Rao making his do-or-die attempt to stay on the state's political map. He had failed to put up any candidates belonging to his breakaway Democratic Telugu Desam (DTD) for the last Lok Sabha poll, and this time there was no sign of any attempt at joining hands with his one-time ally, the Congress(I). Nevertheless, Bhaskara Rao declared that "it is between NBR and NTR. The Congress(I) is irrelevant. Will Rajiv Gandhi become the next chief minister in Andhra Pradesh?" That sounded suspiciously like whistling in the dark for Bhaskara Rao himself has been forced to desert his Vemur constituency in coastal Andhra Pradesh and opt for the hopefully safer Malakpet constituency in Hyderabad.

The state elections this time are essentially triangular in character. The Congress(I) has put up candidates for all 294 seats, adopting independents in the places where its chosen few failed to file their papers. Bhaskara has only one ally, the Majlis-e-Ittihadul Muslimeen, which has been allotted 15 seats, while his DTD is contesting 279. And the Telugu Desam has fielded 249 candidates, leaving the rest to its electoral allies, the Communist Party of India, the Communist Party of India (Marxist), the Bharatiya Janata Party, the Janata and an independent. There are also the jokers in the pack, most notably the 20 candidates put up by the Rayalaseema Vimochana Samithi led by M.V. Ramana Reddi, who has been campaigning for a better deal for the backward Rayalaseema region.

The pre-campaigning thunder was stolen by the Congress(I), but not in a manner that redounds to its credit. The 22 candidates who refused to file their nominations were clearly motivated by the fear of defeat. And Madan Mohan had wanted to change his constituency from Siddipet in Medak (where P. Shiv Shanker lost in December) to Ramayampeta in adjoining Secunderabad, but was not allowed to. But the unhappiness in the Congress(I) ranks went beyond this, to the process of ticket-allocation itself. No fewer than 143 of the 294 candidates suggested by the party's state coordination committee were changed by the subcommittee headed by Darbara Singh—at the behest of state Congress(I) chief Y.S.Rajashekhar Reddy. And both Darbara Singh and AICC(I) General Secretary A.K. Antony were mobbed by protestors when they landed in Hyderabad to quell the revolt.

Nevertheless, there seemed a design to the process of selecting candidates. Antony said: "This is not the last election. Ours is a new, bold, long-term approach to build a strong base for the party, and the list has therefore upset the calculations of some old-timers. But tempers will cool down, and we are confident of giving a new shape to our party and politics in Andhra Pradesh."

If the stress on battles beyond the immediate one suggested an advance conceding of defeat, Rajashekhar Reddy said, "The candidates were selected considering, among other things, whether they were committed party workers who would keep the Congress(I) flag flying high whether they win or lose."

The Telugu Desam went through its minor upheavals too, with NTR deciding to drop 30 per cent of the legislators who had stood by him through the August-September drama last year, including four ministers. Said one of the ministers, Mohammed Shakir: "I was a cloth trader before becoming an MLA in 1983, and I will not hesitate to resume business if I am not given any responsibility."

▶ A swing of 6 per cent to the Congress(I) since the 1984 Lok Sabha election can unseat NTR; his position is not as sound as it might appear from the tally of 188 assembly segments won by the Telugu Desam in the December election.

▶ As the Telugu Desam does not have a long history it is not easy to analyse its Lok Sabha performance. However, during the two years that the party has been in power it has lost some ground.

▶ The average margin of victory in the 1984 Lok Sabha elections was about 10 per cent and the fact that the non-Congress(I) vote is highly united makes the changes in seats very sensitive to swing in this state.

With the candidate-selection process over, the focus shifted briefly to the party manifestos. Bhaskara Rao released the DTD's list of promises, clearly designed to match NTR's in its populist appeal. He offered the subsidised supply of rice and other essential commodities, reservation of jobs and educational seats for minorities, and a job for at least one member of every household. While NTR can be expected to match if not excel this, given his past record of favouring welfarism and give-aways, the Congress(I) itself was readying for the unprecedented step of releasing a separate manifesto for the state. Defence Minister P.V.Narasimha Rao was giving the final touches to the document towards the end of last fortnight, and a party spokesman said it would counter "some of the misapprehensions spread by NTR about Centre-state relations."

The start of campaigning brought its own innovations. Bhaskara Rao took to NTR's style of campaigning in a specially designed van, calling his vehicle the Prajaswamya Ratham (the vehicle of democracy). But NTR went one better, introducing a pilot truck for his Chaitanya Ratham (the chariot of awakening). In the truck were burra katha singers (folk form reconteurs) extolling the Telugu people and NTR, and serving the useful purpose of collecting the crowds well in time for NTR's arrival and characteristically rousing speeches.

But the end result of all this drama and effort would have remained the big question. Going by the results of the December Lok Sabha poll, the Congress(I) should win 75 of the 294 seats, and might stand a chance in 50 others where it trailed by margins of fewer than 5,000 votes. But the fact also is that the Congress(I) has traditionally got fewer votes in assembly elections than parliamentary ones. By that reckoning, the Telugu Desam should improve on the 53 per cent vote that it got in December in conjunction with its allies—unless Bhaskara Rao tilts the scales. What seemed certain at the moment, meanwhile, was the fact that the coming weeks of an advancing summer would witness rising political temperatures as the contestants warmed to the battle.

—AMARNATH K. MENON

Orissa Party 147, the Marxists 15 and even the Rashtriya Sanjay Manch 60.

The scene is bleaker still in neighbouring Bihar and apart from the Janata and the CPI, which have an understanding on 180 seats, the rest couldn't agree on anything. The contest is going to be another tamasha with the Janata fighting 236 seats, the DMKP 280, BJP 250, CPI 167 and the Marxists 50.

In Madhya Pradesh, the problem couldn't be resolved because the BJP, the largest opposition party in the state, couldn't agree on who should call the shots from among former chief ministers Kailash Joshi and Sunder Lal Patwa. As such, it hasn't picked up any local issue with which to hammer the ruling party.

Much the same was true of Uttar Pradesh, the country's most important state politically, where each of some 400 constituencies will see a field of four major contestants. The parties contesting include DMKP with 380 seats, Rashtriya Sanjay Manch 200, and BJP 280. Here too, the opposition parties lack leaders who carry credibility and are well-known through the state, and repeated talk of unity has already caused a credibility problem. Says state BJP president Kalyan Singh: "The more one talks of opposition unity, the greater is the possibility of our losing credibility with the electorate."

The Opposition honeymoon is, likewise, done with in Gujarat, with each party fighting for a larger slice of the cake than the others were prepared to yield. Unity talks, which started late last month, soon became a joke even though former chief minister Babubhai Patel, who doesn't belong to any party at present, worked hard to bring the parties together. Said Patel in disgust: "At least now the Opposition must read the writing on the wall. No one wants to introduce a new morality in politics, these kind of moves always fail."

While the Congress(I) gets off the starting mark with a headstart, there are several reasons to believe that this election will be different from the last one. The December poll was won on the issue of preserving national unity, of ushering in change, of settling the Punjab problem, and to some extent on the strength of a sympathy vote. None of these are live issues in state elections, and the voter is not being asked to choose a young, fresh prime minister but a variety of chief ministers. If all these factors mean that the Congress(I) must find new issues to put before the electorate, the ruling party had quickly found its pitch. Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi said Centre-state amity was necessary for all-round development, and

Congress(I) leaders asked voters to complete the job begun in December and to place full faith in them.

On the strength of past trends, it seems entirely likely that the voter will do just that. In 1972 Mrs Gandhi repeated her parliamentary sweep of 1971 at the state level. In 1977, the Janata Party did likewise, and in 1980 it was once again the Congress(I)'s turn to establish that the voter does not change his preferences quickly. In the present case, the new government in New Delhi has also done well in its month-and-a-half in office, with quick action on a number of fronts giving promise of more to come. There is, quite simply, no reason to expect the voter to decide on switching his preferences, and the only real hope the Opposition has is that state-level issues and state-level personalities will help turn the tide in at least some states.

The other, less tangible prospect is that of a major revolt gathering momentum within the Congress(I), and of rebel candidates marring the ruling party's chances. But most pre-election revolts of this kind have tended to fizzle out, and even if things seem more serious this time round the ultimate result might not be very different. The mid-February picture suggested that the revolt might turn serious only in selected pockets: Vidarbha in Maharashtra, and perhaps in Bihar where the Jagannath Mishra faction might make its unhappiness felt.

If all this does not materialise, it will be the Congress(I) that will be laughing all the way to the hustings. The party is still riding a wave and Rajiv is still riding high on its crest. His message is that of change, a new generation in charge, and even with the blemishes that undoubtedly remain in the Congress(I)'s data sheet for the assembly election, the message is being powerfully conveyed. Rajiv himself will undoubtedly be prime campaigner, once again, and it will be in his name that the election will be fought. The gamble he has taken is a calculated throw of the dice. Many of his party bosses who are unhappy with the way he has shaped the new party are obviously watching closely.

But if Rajiv is able to succeed in his effort to bring about a revolution in values, particularly political values, then it might just mean an end to meal-ticket politics, and just as the discarded MLA's and ministers will fall by the wayside, so too will the doubters of today. And Rajiv will then have succeeded in creating what he now lacks: a party of his own.

—SUMAN DUBEY with PRABHU CHAWLA and bureau reports

RAJIV'S CAMPAIGN

An Unrelenting Pace

THE CONGRESS(I) has no campaigner to match Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, who blazed an unprecedented campaign trail during December's Lok Sabha elections. With the assembly elections to 11 states and one Union territory scheduled for the first week of March, Rajiv was back on the trail, back to his punishing schedule of a couple of hours of sleep a night and up to a dozen scheduled public meetings hundreds of kilometres apart each day. On the very first day of his campaign, February 10, Rajiv covered 1,500 km in Uttar Pradesh visiting Bareilly, Hardi, Shahabad, Basti and Gorakhpur before visiting Jaipur and Agra and returning to Delhi. He was on the trail for 15 hours of non-stop electioneering. Accompanying him for the day in jetliner and helicopter was INDIA TODAY Washington Correspondent, INDERJIT BADHWAR in Delhi on a visit. His impressions of the new prime minister:

AFTER 15 hours of jetting, helicopteering, and motorcading during a whistle-stop election stump that could have made a Harry Truman green with envy, Rajiv Gandhi alighted in Delhi at 11.30 p.m. from his Air Force Boeing 737 fresh and bright-eyed—as if he had spent the day in a leisurely sauna bath.

By all biological logic the Congress(I) leader should have been bleary-eyed and catatonic. During the past six days he had been absorbed in the political bedlam of selecting candidates, for the forthcoming state elections from among hundreds of thousands of aspirants. The pace had been frenetic. His wife, Sonia, hadn't seen him for two days. Confided Dr A. Sahai, his portly and affable personal physician who accompanies him on his trips: "He slept perhaps a total of four hours at the most during the last week. His stamina amazes me. He catnaps every now and then on the plane for five minutes but he wakes up refreshed and rearing to go."

Nine stops, nine rallies, and nine speeches later Rajiv sat relaxed, confident and in an amiable mood in a small private cabin staring fascinated at a crowd of langoors in the trees surrounding the runway as the Boeing hurtled into the sky from Gorakhpur airport. "Actually this trip is pretty cushy, compared to what we went through last week," he remarked referring to the battle over MLA tickets.

But that was only the beginning of the battles that lay ahead. On this election tour, the first of many to come that will take Rajiv to about 400 out of more than 2,500 assembly constituencies over the next 18 days, his strategy was to appeal directly to the people.

Yet, throughout the hectic stump in Uttar Pradesh, Rajiv kept by his side Vishwanath Pratap Singh and Narain Dutt Tiwari—godfathers to many of the formerly powerful and now newly-ticketless Congress(I) members. And from the mood of the people at the rallies and from the speeches of local politicians and Tiwari and Singh it became rapidly clear that coat-tails—at least for the present movement—hang solidly from Rajiv Gandhi.

If there are any doubts about Rajiv being his own man they are dispelled quickly. His body language speaks of a man possessed of an easy confidence and deeply ingrained sure-footedness about life. His stride is purposeful, his handshake effusive, his gaze level, even mischievous. As an old friend put it, "The thing about Rajiv is that the guy is all there. What you see is what he is. He is basically a no bullshit man."

He transmits his obvious personality into his political life so easily that he begins to exude the impression to people who see him in action that basically he is having fun. His closest advisors will tell you that he doesn't really have the time to think whether his new job is fun. But it certainly is not a drag.

The happy warrior image that he projects stems from the fact that the burdens of office sit lightly on his shoulders. His sense of politics is instinctive, his style unrehearsed, his image unforced. Observing him on his Uttar Pradesh stump and listening to politicos on the campaign trail, it dawns on the observer that the lightness with which he manoeuvres and talks comes from a deep belief he is said to harbour, that he owes no great political favours to anybody and that protecting his job—a job he never really wanted—is furthest from his mind.

It is this— and not vigorous political counselling— that has enabled him to take hard decisions with nerve-shattering rapidity. Rajiv's aides maintain that his decisions regarding Antulay, Gundu Rao, Sajjan Kumar and Dhawan were obvious ones, period. Most politicians avoid acting on the obvious— Rajiv doesn't. Even his political approach to the state elections is startling in its simplicity —get rid of the bad guys, no matter how influential and then go straight to the masses for their mandate.

Rajiv's hallmark is his unerring simplicity and earnestness. He has yet to think out his views on complicated issues such as economic and industrial policies. But he makes one thing absolutely clear: he wants change and he wants it quickly. He wants to return to an old-time morality, and he has a religious-like belief in the common sense and uncanny political sophistication of the farmer and the paan-wala. This was the message he took to Uttar Pradesh.

The day-long itinerary— spelled out in meticulous printed detail and including even blocks of time that were chalked out for packed lunches and dinner on board the aircraft, reflected the tight managerial, clockwork control that has become the hallmark of Rajiv's campaign juggernaut. The schedule is formidable. A small illustration: 0835 arrive Bareilly airport; 0910 arrive Shahabad helipad by MI-8 helicopter; public meeting; 0940 depart Shahabad helipad and arrive Gola Gorakhnath 1005 hours...

At most places the crowds were between 50,000 and 60,000 strong and from the spontaneous outpourings of "Rajiv Gandhi Zindabad" it was clear whom they had come to see. The whole process hummed with computer-like efficiency. Rajiv, wearing a kurta and churidar and a buff jacket would climb down rapidly followed by his tall, dark and watchful Security Officer Ravi Nath. A fleet of Ambassador cars, a jeep, an ambulance, stood at the ready and were used only when the speakers' stand was at a distance or if a rally had been planned in the main town. Rajiv would climb to the platform and the rally would start.

There is a unanimous opinion among Rajiv watchers that he has emerged as a powerful public speaker. His delivery is booming but not stentorian. He speaks without notes, weighing his words, and yet effortlessly. The inflection and cadence are distinctively Nehruvian. There are no pregnant pauses. He gropes little and stutters not at all. The Hindi is surprisingly fluent and effective.

Again and again, throughout the day, Rajiv emphasised the need for India "to show the world what we can do...and when India speaks about uplifting the poor people she speaks not only for India's poor but for poor people all across the world. You gave me the strength to strengthen the land," Rajiv told the hundreds of thousands who had come to hear him, "now give me the strength to do it again."

Most of the constituencies Rajiv visited were fielding "clean image" Congress(I) candidates many of whom had never seen a political campaign before. In one district, for example, a Congress(I) ticket had been given to Mohammad Khan, a long-haired, poetic looking eccentric who has a Ph.D. in astrophysics from Cambridge. Rajiv was simple and forthright in his explanation for why so many old-time loyalists had not been given party tickets. He told the crowds: "We want new blood to invigorate this land." And he received thunderous applauses during several speeches in which he stressed special programmes for "uplifting our suppressed women" and launching schemes to clean up pollution from the Ganges.

The sights and sounds of Uttar Pradesh are difficult to miss even during the flurry of a campaign: From the Bareilly runway lined with tiger grass almost touching the plane's wingtips, to the helicopter descent at Gola Gorakhnath in Lakhimpur district bordering the Terai where the smell of putrefying mollasses from sugar factories hangs heavy in the air. As the day wears on, the Delhi chill, where the campaign party started, has given way to the heat of the mid-day sun at Balrampur in Gonda district where women and children from miles in each direction come running out on dusty trails and crowd their roof-tops as they see the helicopters approaching. Local officialdom, out in full force, and proud of its organisational capacity, has provided colourful tents with toilet facilities and aggarbattis redolent of roses for campaign aides while chief stumper Rajiv works his magic before the crowds.

There was laughter among the campaign officials as they scurried out of real choppers in Basti. "Now we're in real Eastern UP Bhaiyya Country," one said. "Use your ears and listen to what that guy's saying," he said. A local politico was introducing Tiwari to the crowd and urging them to be seated. "Apne apne asthaan pe baithiye, asthaan pe.' Stay in your seats," he said, "Did you hear?" the aide said, "The speaker says as-thaan, not sthaan."

In the evening hours the campaign Boeing rises above Gorakhpur airport and heads for a totally new asthaan—Jaipur. After a long drive through the pink city Rajiv addresses an all-India police duty meet, promises the police less political interference in the future and heads for a bara khana in an open-air roofless tent adorned like the Jaipur fort. Under the starlight, 2,000 policemen of all ranks sit a Rajasthani-style on the ground and eat out of thaals and katoras made out of Dhak leaves. On a floodlit stage a troupe performs the traditional ghoomar dance. Rajiv and his party were to eat at a special table indoors. But Rajiv just plonks himself on the ground, crosses his legs and insists on eating traditional style.

Ahead—according to the campaign schedule—lies Agra, the last stop before flying back to Delhi. The local Congress party in Agra is still reeling from the aftermath of a political slaughter. The high command under Rajiv has just wiped out four of the five sitting MLA's from there. Rajiv is uncertain how enthusiastic the rally in Agra will be or whether he will be besieged by the disgruntled ticketless on his arrival there. But that is 45 minutes into the future. Right now the shehnai is soothing and the puris and vegetable koftas and hot crisp jalebis and the starlight somehow just do not mix with politics.

HENRY KISSINGER

"We expected too much of India"

NOBEL Prize winner, once the most powerful person in the US establishment next to the President and now an advisor-about-the-world, Dr Henry Alfred Kissinger was in Delhi last month on his first visit in more than 10 years. "I am a student of international affairs, I write articles, I advise and I have to keep myself informed about various affairs, and there have been tremendous changes in this country," the 61-year-old one-man think-tank said, explaining what he was doing here as a guest of the Indian Government.

It's not an area that he is reputed to know well. Kissinger is best remembered here for the notorious tilt to Pakistan engineered by him on Nixon's behalf during the build-up to the Bangladesh war in December 1971. Visiting India as secretary of state in 1974 on a fence-mending visit, he boosted his image somewhat, but his interests then lay elsewhere: Indo-China and ending the disastrous war there, the opening with China, detente with the Soviet Union.

As a private citizen, Kissinger has become a professional advisor to governments and corporations, a celebrated member of the lecture circuit and an author. His book of the Nixon years, from which INDIA TODAY excerpted the chapter on the Bangladesh war over four issues in late 1979, was a controversial work, not just in its handling of India, but in its narration of those eventful years.

A master diplomat and negotiator—his shared Nobel Peace Prize was recognition of his role in negotiating the end of the Vietnam war—Kissinger had strong views about one adversary he could not beat: Mrs Indira Gandhi. His writings betray a certain admiration for a person who proved to be his equal in diplomacy. "Once one cut through the strident, self-righteous rhetoric, Mrs Gandhi had few peers in the cold-blooded calculation of the elements of power," he wrote in his book. At another point he said: "Mrs Gandhi was a strong personality, relentlessly pursuing India's national interest with single-mindedness and finesse. I respected her strength even when her policies were hurtful to our national interest." Not surprisingly, one of Kissinger's first acts on reaching India was to lay a wreath at her samadhi. "I felt I owed it to her," he said. During his brief visit, Kissinger gave Managing Editor SUMAN DUBEY an exclusive interview. Excerpts:

BHAWAN SINGH

Kissinger: "I'm interested in good relations with India"

Q. Lots of Americans seem to feel that with the change of government in this country, there is now a new opportunity for better Indo-US relations. Do you share this view?

A. Yes. I share that view, but one has to keep in mind that the foreign policies of great nations like ours and yours are determined by certain realities which confine possible changes to certain limits. I say that in order not to put an undue burden on your prime minister. The previous prime minister was a strong leader who defended India's national interest. So will the current one.

I believe that there is considerable room for improvement of relations. Much of it would have happened also under the previous prime minister. The new prime minister can give this additional impetus, and in addition, he represents a new generation and therefore has perhaps fewer of the preconceptions of the previous generation that grew up in the colonial period.

Q. Are you satisfied that the Reagan Administration is doing all it can to help Indo-US relations?

A. No, I don't think they are doing all they can to help things along. The Reagan Administration came into office with certain preconceptions, and they have changed very importantly in their relations with the Soviet Union. I suspect they will now change in their relations with the developing world. But since we cannot deal with the whole of the developing world as a unit effectively, we must deal with some of the key countries, and that again makes India one of the principal countries.

Q. What do you think the Indian Government should do?

A. I think that there should be a continuing dialogue on perceptions of international problems. We don't have to agree, but we should explain to each other periodically what we think the key issues are as we see them and see how we can avoid needlessly irritating each other even while we maintain our national positions. Secondly, there must be something on which Indians and Americans can work together—economic and scientific projects. That would create a body of people on both sides that at least know each other. Thirdly, it is strange how little systematic contact there is. I'm part of a group in which leading Europeans and Americans from the private sector meet once a year. The same exists with Japan. It does not exist with India. The advantage of these private groups is not that they can make policy but it means when there is a problem you can call up and say, look I don't understand this, explain it to me.

Q. Some of us are bothered by the fact that even though India and the US are both democracies, this particular aspect does not figure in American calculations of what is good for this part of the world or what is bad for it.

A. I think India has had an enormous reservoir of goodwill in America and one of the problems is that we expected too much of India. We thought that because India is a democracy, it could act as a judge of all international relationships. In 1961, I was an advisor to President Kennedy and my friend John Kenneth Galbraith was ambassador to India. At that time, there was the Berlin crisis and many in the Kennedy administration thought, if we conducted a certain kind of policy, India would support us. There was the nonaligned meeting in Belgrade in which India took a position between the two sides. There was terrible disappointment in the Kennedy administration—except me, because I said to myself, if Nehru took a position on Berlin critical of the Soviets, he would be jeopardising Indian interests for a subject of no conceivable concern to India. India has no view on Berlin for which it needs to risk a great deal. That is our problem. So paradoxically, if India had been a military dictatorship, we wouldn't have expected it to play that sort of role.

Q. But that role has been resented as well?

A. That's right. India, precisely because it speaks English, is a democracy, and all of us know Indians, we like and have easy relations with them, there is an exceptional demand put on India which isn't fair to India. But I think India has had really more influence in America than it gives itself credit for, and I can tell you at one time I opposed India (during the Bangladesh war in 1971) our media and much of our bureaucracy gave me a terrible time.

Q. In retrospect, that tilt, was it the right thing to do?

A. Yes. I'm not saying that every tactical move was the right thing. When I was security advisor I saw very few ambassadors. L.K. Jha will tell you, he was one of four that I saw regularly before 1971. I did that because I was convinced that we wanted to establish new relationships with many countries, with China, with the Soviet Union, with Europe and with India. For me, for all of us, the events of 1971 were a tragedy. We didn't want them, but we felt that we had no choice. But as soon as the crisis was over, we worked energetically to restore good relations and I came here in 1974. I wouldn't be here today if I weren't interested in good relations with India. I have no other motive for being here.

Q. There's a feeling here that successive US administrations, including the one you were part of, have never treated India as the central point of their south Asian policies. Why is this so?

A. I can't speak for all administrations. I attempted to treat India as a leading country and a central point of south Asian policies. We had in 1971 an inevitable clash that would take too long to explain but which, given our new relationship with China and the role Pakistan played in that at the time, had its own necessities. Then the question is, what does one mean by central role and how does one articulate it, and does that mean one can do nothing without the permission of India? I would say, we should do nothing without discussing with India, but I don't think we should give any country the veto power over our foreign policy in any part of the world.

> "India has had really more influence in America than it gives itself credit for, and I can tell you at one time I opposed India (during the Bangladesh war in 1971) and our media and much of our bureaucracy gave me a terrible time."

Q. Well then, to what extent do you think Indian sensibilities should be taken into account in the formulation of American policies towards this part of the world?

A. I think Indian sensibilities should be taken very much into account.

Q. More than at present?

A. Well, what is lacking at present and has been lacking is a systematic review of policy when there is no problem. For example, Britain had a major influence on American foreign policies for a long time and it still has a big influence—not because they raise an issue every two weeks, but because there is so much dialogue between Britain and America at all levels of government that they have an influence even on policies already formed. As a general proposition, we don't deal with India or India with us until there is already a problem and until both sides have gone a long distance down whatever road they are going. I think we can pay more attention and I think India should pay more attention to us, and that I say without any prejudice to any existing Indian relationship.

Q. One of the reasons this doesn't happen is that the US views problems from a global point of view and India from a very regional point of view, and these perceptions do not meet.

A. Yes and no. Because it seems to me... what does the US want in this subcontinent? Peace, stability and progress. Not even many Americans present this as self-interest. Supposing this area became like the Middle East, divided—which it could be—between seven or eight conflicting states, all in constant rivalry with each other. It would of course not be desirable for the people of the region, but it would lead to endless international conflicts in which everybody could fish in troubled waters. I think that peace, stability and progress in the region is a joint interest.

There are, of course, conflicts between India and Pakistan and between India and Sri Lanka or Bangladesh in which the US does not have the same intensity of interest that India can have, and there we may part company, but we have conflicts in Europe and Latin America of which India has a different perception. We have to learn to live with them.

Q. Couldn't the Americans do more to bring India and Pakistan closer and help the India-Sri Lanka problem instead of, as it is now perceived here, doing things that drag them apart, such as the arms aid?

A. Let's take the India and Sri Lanka problem. I think that your high officials will agree that the US has attempted to play a helpful role and has had many discussions on a serious level with the Indian Government trying to bring about reforms that would make it possible for all the nations here to join in a constructive solution. And we have also expressed a view very similar to that of your government and the President's speech to Parliament, that a purely military solution of the problem is not possible. I think in Sri Lanka I would be surprised if your government had a substantial disagreement with us or our role, but you'd have to ask your government.

Now, on the Pakistan issue, there are two separate problems. There's the arms relationship and there is the general relationship between India and Pakistan. I think the US would like nothing better than improved political relations betwen India and Pakistan. I know for certain, having talked to our leading officials at the very highest level before I came that they would be willing to play any facilitating role that they could in improving this relationship. I have the impression that both parties, specially India, preferred to conduct the negotiations between India and Pakistan as a bilateral matter which is very understandable. I think we could play a facilitating role designed to meet the various concerns of both sides.

On the arms supply, if the Soviet army could be removed from Afghanistan, I think the American perceptions of the problem would alter and remove one of the causes of the arms relationship as it now exists. Secondly, if one looks at the overall strength of the Indian and Pakistan military forces, it is difficult to visualise any rational motive that would cause a Pakistan leader to attack India. But, still, this is a problem. I understand the Indian view but I think considering that I have not yet been to Pakistan, I should not pronounce on this.

Q. Do you think a squadron or two of F16s or whatever is being given to Pakistan really adds to its security against a threat from the Soviets in Afghanistan?

A. There will never be enough arms with Pakistan to protect itself from a full scale attack from the Soviet Union. What American arms can do is to raise the threshold of and the price for harassment of the border regions and for the sort of psychological warfare at which the Soviets are particularly adept.

Q. What would the American reaction be if Soviet forces were to make retaliatory strikes into Pakistan?

A. Well, it is very hard to predict but we have a treaty relationship with Pakistan in relation to such a contingency which would force us to extend some assistance—whether in the form of weapons or in any other form would depend on the situation and on the extent of the attack.

Q. You don't think that the induction of arms to guerrillas in Afghanistan through Pakistan creates a situation for precisely this sort of problem? The Indian perception of Afghanistan is to work for a political settlement whereas the Americans seem to be opting for a military settlement.

A. With all due respect, it is wrong. When there are 130,000 Soviets in Afghanistan, you cannot say that the US is opting for a military settlement. We did not put the troops in Afghanistan. We have nothing in Afghanistan. We were content with what we considered a pro-Soviet government headed by Daoud who certainly gave our allies plenty of trouble and was never considered a source of great comfort to us. I believe that if Soviet troops were withdrawn from Afghanistan, American aid to the freedom fighters or whatever you call them should stop. Refugees should be permitted to return and then normal political processes should continue. Countries of the region should guarantee the neutrality, independence, non-alignment and demilitarisation of Afghanistan with the US having no role in this whatsoever, or the Soviet Union.

> "If the Soviet army could be removed from Afghanistan, American perceptions of the problem would alter and remove one of the causes of the arms relationship (with Pakistan) as it now exists."

Q. How do you think this can be brought about?

A. India or even Iran or any other country of the region that is acceptable should do this. We want nothing in Afghanistan except the withdrawal of Soviet forces. I think there should be negotiations, initially including the US and the Soviet Union. I think India could play a very major role in this and maybe make a specific proposal.

Q. Do you believe that the Soviet Union does indeed threaten Pakistan in search of a warm water port as is commonly hypothesised?

A. Well, I happen to think that the fundamental thrust of Soviet policy will be aimed towards Iran, but each of these moves has its own corollary. And so I believe that Pakistan, through Baluchistan, will not be able to escape those pressures. I think the major thrust is against Iran, and when I say that I don't mean next week, or month or even next year. I am saying as a strategic direction, because I think that the Iranian economy complements the Soviet economy, and because it gives them an easy and direct outlet into the oil regions of the Middle East.

Q. What you're saying is that the Soviets would like to secure Iran as an area of their influence?

A. At a minimum. But you see, the way the Soviet Union acts depends on many factors. I am not saying that the Soviets have a fixed timetable in which they are going to do this; and they may possibly never do it. This is, I think, a strategic objective.

Q. One of the nightmares here is of Pakistan getting a nuclear bomb. There is speculation and some evidence in scientific circles that it is very close to it or already has it. What would you do in such circumstances, knowing that it is going on and in spite of the best efforts to prevent it?

A. There is an amendment, the so-called Symington amendment, that prohibits any security assistance to any country that is actually working on a bomb. And if we should have any irrefutable evidence to that effect, we would be bound by our law to carry that out. Secondly, India is the only country that has set off a nuclear explosion and that has also announced that it would not build nuclear weapons, which is a great tribute to India. I think, therefore, perhaps it might be possible for both India and Pakistan to sign a joint statement or two separate statements that they will neither build weapons of this kind nor ever use them against each other, or any other set of measures of that kind. I would greatly welcome this.

Q. Do you think we are entering a less tense and violent phase in the rest of this century? What do you think the 21st will be like?

A. I think the next four years are really very important. We have a president with a huge mandate. You have a prime minister with a huge majority. The Soviets have certain necessities. If we all act in a far-sighted spirit, we can by the end of this decade bring about a change which will see us to the end of this century. Then what happens in the 21st century is hard to foretell, but I hope we can bring about a qualitative change in relationships.

DESERTERS

Taking a Hard Line

EIGHT months after it suffered the severest trauma since the Chinese invasion the Indian Army is now all set to bring the curtain down on the infamous Sikh "mutiny" of June last year. Nearly 2,000 Sikh soldiers, a majority of them recruits or jawans with very short service, are being committed to General Court Martial (GCM) at Jabalpur and Allahabad and most of them face dismissal from service if not worse. The decision to court-martial them, taken after a great deal of thought and discussions with the Government, is considered a landmark of sorts. Such a large number of men have never been collectively prosecuted for insubordination in the history of the Indian defence forces barring the mass trial of Netaji Subhash Chandra Bose's men on the eve of Independence.

The decision to commit the errant troops to GCM follows a detailed inquiry conducted by a committee headed by the major-general commanding the Madhya Pradesh area. The committee, which included a Sikh brigadier, visited practically all the places where major acts of desertion or insubordination had taken place and submitted a detailed report to the chief of army staff. It is reported that while GCM proceedings are being launched against most of the mutinious Sikh troops and non-commissioned officers, inquiry proceedings are also being launched against a few officers—including a brigadier—for alleged dereliction of duty on account of their failure to correctty foresee the brewing discontent.

Sources in the Defence Ministry point out that a large majority of the 2,000-odd troops are being tried for insubordination and may get away with mere dismissal from the army. But a much stiffer punishment may be in store for about 40 others, most of whom were involved in the mutiny at the Sikh Regimental Centre at Ramgarh, in Bihar, where the Centre Commandant Brigadier S.C. Puri was shot dead and another officer injured. The inquiry committee has painstakingly separated these men, alleged to be the ring leaders who misled and incited others, for trial under specific sections of the Army Act for serious offences like murder, seditious activity and armed revolt.

The committee's report is believed to be severe on a number of middle-rung officers who have been indicted for failing to read the situation and take preventive steps before trouble broke out. For example, at Ramgarh as well as at Sriganganagar in Rajasthan, the officers failed to detect the presence of agent provocateurs who spread rumours about destruction of the Golden

Temple and alleged army atrocities on Punjab villagers, particularly women. In a number of places ring leaders organised meetings of young jawans at the unit gurudwaras and delivered inflammatory speeches, followed by the ardas—the holy pledge—to avenge the attack on the Golden Temple. In some cases irate jawans had gathered at the gurudwaras in a drunken state and it had been reported to the officers either by some junior commissioned officers or the army granthis. Yet corrective steps were not taken immediately in most places resulting in unpleasant incidents in units spread all over the country, from Kashmir to tripura.

Within defence circles, the decision to prosecute the troops has come after an intense debate with officials in the Defence Ministry taking a softer line and advocating leniency since the "incidents had taken place in a peculiar set of circumstances." Supporters of this view pointed out that while by and large the Sikhs soldiers and officers had remained faithful, a small number revolted due to purely emotional reasons and a show of leniency, could win them back to the fold. This was also the argument of the group of retired Sikh generals, including figures like Lt-General Harbaksh Singh, who commanded the Indian forces in the western sector in the 1965 war and Lt-General Sartaj Singh, who wrote a joint appeal to the President seeking pardon for the Sikh troops. "The Sikh soldiers," the letter said, "are steeped in religious tradition" and pointed out that all Sikh units go to the gurudwara before going into action and take a copy of Guru Granth Sahib into battle. With their religion so deeply imbued in their martial tradition, the generals argued, it was understandable that they got upset on hearing of the army's action at Amritsar and "set out to protect their shrine".

It seems that initially the Government too was inclined to share this view and Mrs Gandhi had, in fact, made a statement that the mutineers' cases would be considered sympathetically. Some officials in the Defence Ministry also mentioned the case of almost complete mutiny in a battalion of the Assam Regiment posted in Kashmir in 1959 following which the unit was disbanded and the troops sacked. A large number of troops in the battalion were Mizos. Later, these frustrated, jobless men formed the core of the Mizo National Army in 1965. It was argued that sacking of a large number of trained Sikh soldiers could lead to a similar situation.

But what ultimately clinched the issue was the tradition of the Indian defence forces where insubordination in the past was not pardoned even when it was caused purely by patriotic fervour. For example, even the nationalist government decided to proceed with the trials of the captured INA men as indiscipline in the armed forces was considered unpardonable. Similar examples were cited from the 1857 struggle and, in the post-Independence period, the uprising in an armoured corps unit and several battalions of the Uttar Pradesh Armed Constabulary and CRPF. In each case stiff follow-up action was taken. According to those supporting a tough line, including Lt-General Tirath Singh Oberoi who retired on November 30 as general officer commanding-in-chief, Southern Command, a show of leniency now could set a dangerous precedent which any other communal group could exploit in future. "We have a multi-religious, multi-lingual army. Special treatment for any one group can only spell danger as all others would seek the same treatment for themselves. It will really be like sanctifying mutinies," said a senior Defence Ministry official.

But trials and punishment now will only solve a part of the problem and senior officers are now engaged in a process of rethinking on the best possible way to repair the emotional damage within the forces. As a beginning, Sikh officers are likely to be included in GCM's wherever possible. On a broader plane, sources point out, an effort is made to underline the fact that the Sikhs are still trusted with sensitive posts. The key to discipline and harmony, said an officer, will be a successful expression of this confidence. And obviously, no one could be more aware of that grim reality now than the men entrusted with the job of running the world's fourth biggest army.

NATIONAL SECURITY GUARDS

Cutting Edge

FROM conception to the first stages of growth it has been a long road for National Security Guards (NSG), the fledgeling, super-elite anti-terrorist force now being trained at a number of defence establishments. After a series of doctrinal changes,cuts in manpower and funds,the idea has now boiled down to the raising of 5,000 fighting men like the famed Special Air Service (SAS) of the British Army.

Last month, the very first elements of the new force were coming into being. The initial batches hardly needed any special training drawn as they are from the by now well-known Special Group of the Chakrata-based Special Frontier Force (SFF) which participated in Operation Bluestar and now looks after the prime minister's security. The entire strength of this group, about three companies in all, is to be integrated into the NSG. Officials explain that since the SFF special group men already have training in anti-terrorism operations it will be easy to build the force around them.

The plan is being executed by R.T. Nagrani, currently Director-General (Security) in the Cabinet Secretariat. He is aided by Major-General Naresh Kumar who recently retired from the army and has commanded the 57 Mountain Division looking after Tripura and K. Dadabhoy, a former CRPF inspector-general besides a string of officers drawn from the army,Indian Police Service, BSF, CRPF and Indo-Tibetan Border Police (ITBP).

The force is likely to be a cross between the SAS and West German Grenzschutzgruppe-9, popularly known by the acronym GSG-9. The West German force was raised out of the country's paramilitary border guards to counter the growing menace of the Baader-Meinhoff gang and proved its worth in the Mogadishu raid. Officials who have been studying the doctrine and charter of the various special anti-terrorist forces the world over feel the NSG will end up looking more like GSG-9. But it will be much larger in terms of manpower, even though the Government has heavily slashed the original proposal to raise 25 battalions. What prevailed ultimately was the argument that not only was the cost of raising such a large elite force prohibitive, but that it could also lead to a dilution in standards as commandos are a very special breed of men, physically as well as psychologically.

While it is understandable that the bulk of the strength will come from the army, volunteers are also being sought from the BSF, CRPF and ITBP. Even in the army, the search is not confined to the commando and para units. Like the SAS, men and officers from all fighting arms are eligible to seek a short tenure in the NSG and the selection would be based on their record, fitness and motivation. The NSG idea is to hire dedicated volunteers in the 20-25 years age group so as to utilise them in the prime of their youth.

Commando on duty

BHAWAN SINGH

The men's training will consist of specialised skills in commando warfare, priming and defusing of explosives, slithering from helicopters, diving, close-quarter combat and subversion. Officials have already begun scouring the world markets for suitable weapons. The choice of a sophisticated assault rifle has fallen on the West German Heckler and Koch. The shopping list includes night sights, silencers, laser and thermal imaging equipment and the latest bullet-proof gear. Similarly, special simulated conditions are provided for training. For example, the airlines have been asked to loan various types of passenger aircraft for training in anti-hijacking operations. The idea, said an officer, is to ensure that when the guards raid a Boeing 737 to rid it of hijackers they should know the layout of the aircraft like the palm of their hands.

The project, however, is bound to run into some difficulties. For example, many officials feel that the force will suffer because it has been put under the charge of the Union Home Ministry which was never known for professional, efficient handling of the paramilitarty forces under its command. Said an officer: "Giving NSG to the Home Ministry is the best way to convert it into yet another of the usual, lathi-wielding, overused and overstretched forces. Most of our operational officers are bound to be drawn from the army and it would be best to leave it to the Defence Ministry. Also, there are doubts as to the wisdom of drawing men from paramilitary forces. Too much variety, it is feared, could result in a hotch-potch.

But the men raising the force are making light of these fears. As the insignia of the new force they have chosen the Sudarshan Chakra,the legendary cutting wheel on Lord Krishna's finger. That is what NSG is expected to grow into, a fast-moving, razor-sharp force that zeros in on difficult targets with telling effect. And with terrorism now having come to stay it will not be short of opportunities to prove itself.

IFAD

Food for Thought

AT A TIME when it has become an almost obsessive ritual to berate multilateral institutions of the United Nations system in forums ranging from New York to Vienna, some genuine tears are being shed over the funding crisis faced by the rising star of the UN system, the International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD). The real irony here is not provided by the crucifixion of UNESCO amid the efforts to save IFAD, but by the fact that a generally acclaimed agricultural development organisation cannot be given money at a time when European television screens are full of haunting images of dying Ethiopian children and the catastrophic famine afflicting large areas of Africa.

The philosophy of the small group of professionals at IFAD is to extend a different kind of help: self-help. Not handouts but hand-ups to a better life. IFAD's tightly defined mandate focuses sharply on helping small holders, landless labourers and country craftsmen in developing countries to increase their food production. To them, a hoe may be more precious than a tractor, a fishing net more relevant than a deep sea trawler, and a reliable market outlet more important than anything else. Even the world's poorest farmers and fishermen know how to farm or fish. What they lack is the means to do so effectively and profitably. IFAD's role is to help make these means available through low cost, grassroots projects designed to reach the maximum number. And against the backdrop of the perilous situation in Africa, it seems suicidal to destroy a well-tuned weapon against hunger.

The problem is money, with squabbles over future contributions breaking out between the 20-member group from the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) countries and the 12-member OPEC (Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries) group. Despite encouragement from benefactors like UN Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar and former Austrian Chancellor Bruno Kreisky, IFAD has fallen prey to various diplomatic gremlins: the Americans wanted to contribute less, OECD wanted parity in 'burden sharing' between its members and those of OPEC. In fact, some OPEC members like Libya and Iran have stopped contributing to IFAD. So while IFAD has committed nearly $ 2 billion in rural development projects throughout the world, the donors cannot even agree to the agency's threadbare $1 billion level. IFAD officials told INDIA TODAY that it would have less than $100 million available for activities in 1985: close to starvation level for the organisation.

IFAD

IFAD has won near unanimous approval since 1978, with even the parsimonious Reagan Administration's officials saying that it has 'out-performed' every other agency.

And yet, IFAD was a child born of UN remorse. It was established when it became evident that all the international development agencies were not really able to attain their objectives because they could not get down to the grassroots: the farmers. The agency grew out of the UN World Food Conference in Rome in 1974. Its advocates saw the need for a new agency to focus on the needs of the rural poor so as to step up food production. So IFAD was established in 1977 with its headquarters in Rome, and began its operations the following year with $1 billion in funds for 1978-80.

From the start, IFAD has been a different kind of agency. Unlike UNESCO or the United Nations itself, it is not another sprawling international bureaucracy. It employs no more than 80 professionals and 101 support staff. It is also the only international financial institution in which the OECD and OPEC are major constituents. And the traditional donor-nations of the West had been delighted to see the oil-rich nations taking over the burden of running the agency.

IFAD has won near-unanimous approval since 1978, with even the parsimonious Reagan administration's officials saying that it has 'out-performed' just about every other agency. As of now, IFAD has financed 152 projects in 83 developing countries at a total cost of about $8.2 billion, of which its own share is $1.9 billion. The balance has come from other donors and the governments concerned. Most of the projects are in 65 countries classified as low income, food deficit states. And the expected addition to agricultural production resulting from the IFAD-aided projects is estimated at 20 million tonnes, including 16 million tonnes of food (in terms of wheat equivalent). This equals 25 per cent of the 1981 cereal deficit of all developing countries.

Some of the innovative approaches to providing credit to small farmers and landless labourers in south Asia have produced impressive results. The Grameen Bank in Bangladesh ('A bank for the Landless') started as a pilot project in one district and with IFAD support was expanded to five others. Ten thousand groups have been formed with membership from among landless men and women. The credit recovery rate is reportedly 96 per cent—thus exploding the myth that the poor cannot repay loans. In Nepal, under the Small Farmer Development Project, 1,500 groups have been formed with a membership of 20,000, involving a total population of one lakh.

In India, IFAD projects include the Bhima Command Area Development, where 13,000 hectares of the proposed 62,000 hectares have been brought under irrigation, enabling farmers to raise an additional groundnut crop. There is also the Sunderbans Development Project, the Madhya Pradesh Medium Irrigation Project and last year the second Uttar Pradesh Public Tubewells Project.

So far so good. But now the funding crisis threatens to make IFAD a 10-year wonder. A fresh round of negotiations is about to begin at the Rome headquarters. And if a compromise solution is not swiftly found, it will signal the untimely demise of this least well-endowed but most resourceful of UN agencies at a time when its innovative experiments seem indispensable in those indigent nations ensnared in the poverty trap.

Does your child suffer from persistent sore eyes? Are they red and watery? Have small, pinkish-grey lumps formed inside the eyelids giving the feeling that there is sand in the eyes? These could be symptoms of Trachoma. And Trachoma can lead to blindness. So, if the symptoms persist, contact a doctor or the nearest government health unit without delay for prompt and proper treatment.

Remember, Trachoma is spread by human touch or flies and is commonly seen in people living in crowded, dirty areas. So, to avoid infection, wash your child's eyes with clean water, drying them with a clean cloth, at bedtime every night. Also, if you cannot avoid kajal, use a different finger for different people and keep kajal away from dirt and dust.

Thousands of children go blind because of Trachoma every year. Don't let this happen to your child.

For a free booklet on the prevention of blindness in children, write to the following address indicating the language of your choice: Voluntary Health Association of India, C-14, Community Centre, Safdarjang Development Area, New Delhi 110 016.

ITALIAN INVESTMENT

SNAMPROGETTI, the Italian fertiliser giant, may soon invest in the share capital of two fertiliser projects in the country. To start with, the company will be investing up to Rs 25 crore in the project being set up by the Birla-owned Zuari Agro-Chemicals at Sawai Madhopur in Rajasthan. Snamprogetti has also offered to invest in the equity capital of the Kakinada fertiliser project, which has been hanging fire for some years and which was recently bagged by the Andhra Pradesh-based Nagarjuna group. This latter project had been virtually pocketed by Larsen & Toubro, which had entered into a pact with Haldor Topsoe (50 per cent of whose shares are held by Snamprogetti). Larsen & Toubro's Chairman, N.M. Desai, had in fact announced that his company planned to invest in the fertiliser plant. But the state Government preferred a local enterprise and Larsen & Toubro was pipped at the post.

WANGLING WASTELANDS

A NUMBER of companies have staked their claim to a role in afforesting the country's wastelands. With the Government announcing the setting up of a National Wastelands Development Board that will undertake massive forestry programmes on the country's wastelands, private industries that need wood-based raw materials (the paper industry is one) have told the Government that they would like some of the wastelands to be allotted to them. One demand is that the Government hand over 5 per cent of the total wastelands in the country to private industry. Meanwhile, companies like Hindustan Lever which had earlier sought the Government's permission for relatively modest allocations of land are now upping their demand. Lever had initially asked for a few thousand hectares in the Andamans, but this is now being upscaled. Industry as a whole senses that the Government might be inclined to allow private corporate enterprise a role in afforestation.

CLEARING HURDLES

THE GOENKA take-over of Dunlop India ran into unexpected hurdles recently when the Reserve Bank decided to ask a series of clarificatory questions on the precise details of the take-over. This followed a formal application by the Goenkas for acquiring 10 per cent of Dunlop's shares in partnership with the Dubai-based M.R. Chhabria. But it is understood that answers to the Reserve Bank's questions have been to the RBI's satisfaction. The Goenkas might eventually acquire 20 per cent of Dunlop's equity in collaboration with Chhabria, which means that Dunlop Holdings of UK will continue to hold on to the remaining 20 per cent of its initial 40 per cent holding.

A FITTING FINALE

THE GOVERNMENT has finally emerged the winner from its longstanding dispute with the Motion Pictures Export Association of America (MPEAA). The powerful Hollywood-based MPEAA has conceded the Government's demands, which will vastly enhance the Government's revenues from film imports. The Government-owned National Film Development Corporation (NFDC), which will sign the new deal, will receive a minimum canalising fee of Rs 26.5 lakh annually for the import of 75 to 100 Hollywood films. The highest earning so far was Rs 3.8 lakh in 1981-82.

BREAKING EVEN

Chart by B.K. SHARMA

THE SEVENTH Five-Year-Plan may face a serious resource crisis, but the sixth plan will end next month with an overall growth rate of around 5.4 per cent, the best in any plan so far. This is partly helped by the fact that the base year used for this calculation was a depressed one (GNP fell 5.1 per cent in 1979-80). Nevertheless, two of the five years of the sixth plan saw above average growth, two witnessed below average performances, and one recorded a middling performance. Yet the future outlook is uncertain.

COMPUTER CONTENTION

SEVERAL computer companies have been presented with hefty tax demands by the excise authorities, following investigations and raids conducted in recent weeks. The Government has charged the computer companies with excise evasion through the practice of splitting their sales bills and showing a part of the sums payable as software and technical service fees. Hindustan Computers and its sister companies have been presented with a Rs 5-crore bill, and the industry as a whole has been asked to pay up roughly Rs 15 crore. But the computer companies have contended that separate fees for software and technical services are in line with international practice, and that the Government does not levy any excise duty on companies that provide only software and maintenance services. One verdict on the subject so far, delivered by the Collector of Central Excise (Appeals) in Madras in a case concerning Sunray Computers, has gone against the Government, but the excise authorities remain convinced that much of what was being charged as software and technical service fees was in reality a part of the price of the hardware sold. If the courts agree with that, the computer companies could be in hot water.

GROWTH RATE

Dubious Declines

WINSTON Churchill was in the habit of sending curt memos to his ministers and officials during the war. "Pray let me know, on a foolscap sheet of paper, what we should do to draw the United States into the war." Rajiv Gandhi would benefit greatly if he were to take a page out of Churchill's book, and dash off an urgent memo to the Planning Commission. "Pray let me know, on a quarto sheet of paper, what we should do to step up our measly rate of growth."

It is not so much the poor rate of growth, which is more or less frozen around 3.5 per cent a year, as the slowdown in the growth rate, particularly industrial growth rate, that seems to be the main problem. There have been ups and downs, of course, but the annual industrial growth rate has come down steadily from an average of 5.8 per cent between 1952 and 1959 to 4.3 per cent between 1968 and 1975. Since then there has been a slight improvement—the growth rate between 1976 and '83, the year of the record harvest, was 5 per cent—but it is still less than what it was in the '50s and early '60s.

The Planning Commission ought to appoint a task force to find out why this is so. It is not enough to say, as some apologists of the establishment do, that the slowdown is a feature of most economies and has undoubtedly something to do with the world-wide disruption in industry following the heavy rise in petroleum prices. At a seminar held at MIT (Massachusetts Institute of Technology) not long ago, four reasons were cited for the slowdown, namely:

► Slow growth is a result of the overall industrial policy regime which, as a result of comprehensive controls and a systematic blunting of foreign and domestic competition, led to inefficiencies and creation of a high cost industrial structure. The way out obviously is to liberalise the economy.

► It could well be that the inefficiencies themselves are a result of inadequate aggregate demand. Government policies since the mid-'60s have not been expansionary enough and things can be improved by pumping demand through higher public investment and/or better income distribution.

► Public investment has declined because there are not enough resources, despite the fact that the savings ratio is higher than ever. There are two ways out: tax agriculture and/or get more funds through foreign investment.

► Capital output ratios have been rising and this has affected growth. But that by itself is no explanation. It is possible that the answer lies in the nature of the political structure, in which case liberalisation may not be an easy policy.

The prime minister has done well to announce that the industrial sector would be thrown open to competition but this should apply both to public as well as private sector industry.

The rise in the capital-output ratios may be a contributory factor but it is not only in India that capital-output ratios are rising. They are going up all over the world. In the world market economies, they have gone up from 4 per cent in 1960-1965 to 7 per cent in 1970-1980, an increase of 75 per cent, and from 3 per cent to 5 per cent in the developing economies during the same period. But in the case of India, the high capital-output ratios are due as much to the high cost of capital plant as to the poor performance of the system as a whole. The public sector functions with much less efficiency than the private sector and the fact that the bulk of resources go into the former must be an important factor contributing to poor growth. Every industrial unit consumes resources at the same time as it generates them.

It is wrong to say that the inefficiencies themselves are a result of inadequate aggregate demand. The state electricity boards function at what is almost certainly a pretty low level of efficiency but that is not because of lack of demand for power. The boards lose around Rs 600 to Rs 750 crore a year and are totally dependent on the exchequer for their expansion plans. The public sector steel plants are also in the same boat. If there was no demand for steel, we wouldn't be importing so much steel year after year, while the steel plants lost money at the rate of a crore of rupees a day.

The prime minister has done well to announce that the industrial sector would be thrown open to competition but this should apply both to the public as well as the private sector industry. Let the Planning Commission or the Industry Ministry be asked to draw up a five-year plan for modernisation which should cut across the two sectors and whose main purpose should be to raise industrial efficiency all around. Its performance should be judged not by how much it invests—the steel industry has been gobbling up resources year after year without much improvement in its functioning—but what resources it is able to generate from within. It should be dissuaded from going to the Government for funds and should instead compete in the open market for resources for expansion. A report that three public sector companies will soon be issuing debentures is to be welcomed. Rajiv Gandhi said the other day that the administrative system should be separated from the political system. This applies to the public sector system also. The more the industry has to fall back upon itself and not the Government for all its requirements, the more efficient it will be.

Modernisation need not be confined to the import of plant and equipment only. Know-how is one thing but do-how is even more important and there is no reason why we can't learn to do things the others do by buying and operating plants abroad. This is what the Chinese are doing. They have sent out scouts to look over companies in the US and elsewhere which are for sale and can be picked up for a song. These are brand new companies in such sunrise sectors as electronics and not old fossils rusting in the sun. The Chinese are reported to be spending over $ 100 million a year on such purchases, which is a flea-bite. It is, of course, one thing to buy companies abroad and run them there in their kind of environment and quite another to run them here but there is no reason why we should not try the Chinese experiment. Modernisation means nothing unless we come out of our shell and that is precisely what the Chinese seem to be doing. Incidentally, the industrial growth rate in China was nearly twice ours throughout the seventies.

AUTOMOBILES

Clearing the Way

FOR THE motorist, it's heady news. Next year may see the first home-assembled Toyota, Mitsubishi, Nissan and Peugeot cars roll out on to Indian roads. More world famous models could be round the curve. For automobile companies are revving up to cash in on a landmark government decision that allows even truck manufacturers to make cars, and vice versa. Predicts Subodh Bhargava, chief executive of the tractor company Eicher Goodearth: "The Government's decision will push products closer to the state of art than the consumer has been used to for years."

The official notification has come like high-octane fuel to an industry that is only now astir after years of technological slumber—and thrown up for grabs a market dominated by clunky, obsolete roadsters. A truck company executive gleefully says that he receives three or four phone calls a day from people asking him when his firm will move into car production—willy-nilly sending thoughts spinning in that direction. And auto firms are casting about for opportunities, charting unplumbed waters and giving notice that they will poach on others' traditional, jealously guarded preserves.

But even as the dovecotes are aflutter, several questions remain unanswered. Will the new cars be too pricey for a mass market to open up? Can a large market come into being with 35 per cent of the price of a car going to the exchequer with high petrol prices and poor roads? Will the Government permit auto manufacturers to expand capacity to attain economies of scale, and to import the equipment needed? (Manufacturers claim that much of the equipment to set up car plants has to be imported.) And what of the components required? The components industry is five to seven years behind the vehicles industry in terms of technology, and the scramble has just begun.

For all that, auto manufacturers are jockeying for the fast track. For some a venture into cars is just a question of timing. The four new light commercial vehicle (LCV) manufacturers are too far gone down the production road to change track immediately, with vehicles ready to roll out of assembly lines in the next two to seven months. Still, DCM-Toyota's Executive Director Vivek Bharat Ram says his company is looking at car production possibilities. The company will turn out jeeps by the year-end and may import Toyota car components from Japan and assemble them here next year. Eicher Motors will mark time till early next year and talk to its collaborator Mitsubishi Motor Corporation before taking the passenger car plunge. Jeep manufacturer Mahindra & Mahindra is eyeing Peugeot and American Motors cars (the company has collaboration agreements with both firms). Says Balchandra Sule, managing director of Mahindra & Mahindra, "We don't want to make something which everybody else is making. And Allwyn Nissan will review the car option in the next few months. But it could also move in the opposite direction, from LCV's into heavy tonnage trucks and mini-buses.

Other automobile corporations are still cagey about plans, but cars could roll over their horizon too. Says Jayant Talaulicar, vice-chairman and managing director of Tata Engineering and Locomotive Company (TELCO): "We have plenty of ideas but nothing that we would like to disclose at this stage." He adds that though TELCO could design a car, design imports would be a quicker route to production. TELCO displayed an estate wagon called the Tatamobile at a trade fair in the capital five years ago, and is believed to be among the best equipped to swiftly shift to other vehicle manufacturing lines.

But not all are making a foray into cars. Truck and bus heavy-weight Ashok Leyland is surveying the LCV market. R.J. Shahaney, the company's managing director, says that Leyland has on its agenda LCV's "of a different load carrying capacity altogether from the type Allwyn Nissan, DCM-Toyota or the others are planning".

The flurry of activity in the industry is grounded in a number of calculations. The Government's relaxed guidelines are at raising capacity all round. The market is still in the dumps, and heavy tonnage truck makers with flagging figures can use idle capacities by broadening their product range. But this inevitably raises the question of priorities. Should truck capacity be diverted to cars, should foreign exchange be spent to enable this diversion? D.V. Kapur, secretary in the department of heavy industry, is carefully non-committal: "The aim was to encourage automakers to develop their own technology. The Government will look at the question of foreign technology and a number of other issues, including the foreign exchange question.".

MEANWHILE, the automobile and auto component industries are in for a major convulsion. While a leaner, more on-the-ball industry may eventually be born, the birth pangs are likely to be painful. With so many companies looking for a piece of the action, dog-fights over markets are on the cards and some will inevitably scald their fingers. Yet the new policy will help breathe life into ancillary industry segments where real growth is slack. Automobile companies may farm out more work to attain speed and efficiency, with even in-house ancillary "aggregates" like standard engines, axles and transmissions being contracted out to component makers. Finally, with component manufacturers catering to different requirements, the on-going process of specialisation will be speeded up. As International Instruments Ltd (IIL) Chairman and Managing Director N. Sudhakar puts it, "A speedometer will become not just a speedometer but a speedometer for an LCV, another for a passenger car, and a third for a motorcycle."

Automobile and component industry executives are clearly excited about the dramatic turn in official policy, but many point out a rash of car factories coming up overnight. For the long road to more car production is pot-holed, and a roster of problems could come in the way of the industry. Some companies may have to plough into new car plants up to 70 per cent of the amounts now sunk in plant and machinery, since much of the equipment is not common to truck and car production. Argues an automobile company executive: "Entire production lines have to be built, the sheet metal is different, the engine block is different." Much of the new plant and equipment may have to be bought abroad. The big questions are whether the Government will sanction the foreign exchange needed and the capacities that some firms will have. Eicher plans to ask for a raise from 12,000 to 40,000 or more, and DCM-Toyota from 15,000 to 50,000. Even if the Government gives the green signal, some of the cars could be billed in the Rs 465,000 to Rs 90,000 range. Sniffs a company executive: "Cars have to compete with houses when it comes to consumer buying decisions."

The biggest roadblock may be the time lag between the automobile and ancillary firms' schedules. As company officials put it, component companies were caught napping by the technological ferment and vehicle component indigenisation programmes will be thrown out of gear and cost estimates may go haywire. Says Vivek Bharat Ram: "Virtually no automobile part made in the country is of international quality today. At least Rs 400 crore has to be invested in the ancillary industry. This is not happening and even if it is, it's happening with a time lag. Vehicle company schedules will be upset unless new component plants come up." Most auto manufacturers plan to use 40 to 45 per cent Indian components in the first year of production, to be raised to 100 per cent in the fifth year, but such programmes may have to be staggered out over seven to 10 years.

"Virtually no automobile part made in the country is of international quality today."

"The Japanese want to extend CKD exports to India as long as they can."

PRAN TALWAR
President, Automotive Component Manufacturers' Association

But ancillary producers tell a different story. Says Pran Talwar, president of the Automotive Component Manufacturers' Association of India, "Maruti and DCM-Toyota haven't given us enough lead time," needed to produce heavy duty components to new specifications. Ancillary units have genuine problems in getting raw materials, face equipment limitations and suddenly have had to meet the requirements of a host of new generation vehicles.

Much of the pessimism among auto men stems from the crop of problems Maruti Udyog has run into. The public sector company was supposed to achieve 30 per cent indigenisation by this March; it will be lucky if it hits the 25 per cent level. Maruti will be turning out over 20,000 cars this year, almost a third of the industry's output, and the component volumes required aren't around. Many suppliers did not sink money into new production facilities, believing that Maruti would not get off the ground or would fail to stick to production schedules. Chloride India was supposed to feed Maruti with batteries, but is now importing them and supplying them to the company since it is servicing a large Soviet order.

Government officials concede that technology has to be upgraded in areas like fuel injection equipment, pistons and shock absorbers and capacity has to be expanded for a few products. But the Government is licensing new capacity, excise on ancillary products may be cut to lure in entrants to the business, and the overall position is not worrisome, an Industry Ministry official claims.

The silver lining in all this is that both vehicle and component manufacturers are finally moving on the ancillary front. Maruti will invest up to 26 per cent of the equity of a few new units that will bring fresh know-how and capacity to areas where these are scarce. Eicher is talking to 25 to 30 small units about meeting its needs and putting them in touch with Mitsubishi for technology, and Allwyn Nissan is following suit.

The bigger component manufacturers are independently winging their way abroad in quest of new technology. Thus Clutch Auto has tied up with Aisen Seiki of the Toyota group, IIL signed up last September with Nippondenso, also of the Toyota stable, for dashboard instruments, Bharat Gears has a collaboration with Koyo Seiko for steering gears, Pran Talwar's Talbros Automotive Components approached UK collaborator Payen and struck a deal for gasket know-how with Sanwa, a Japanese company in which Payen has a stake, and Lucas is making overtures to Hitachi. And in a deal that dovetails the investment needs of Shri Ram Fibres and the product requirements of DCM-Toyota, Shri Ram Fibres is venturing into electrical parts manufacture with Nippondenso.

Confirms Eicher's Bhargava, "Several component companies are talking to the Japanese." Many of these are visibly aware of the importance of a Japanese connection, and fear that vehicle manufacturers will be tied down by Japanese collaborators to buying components made to Japanese specifications. Secondly, many believe that Japanese know-how provides cost savings of up to 20 per cent, compared with US or European technology, with its emphasis on conserving materials and using plastics to make lighter vehicles, thus saving on fuel. TTL's Sudhakar convinced West German collaborator VDO that if his firm did not tie up with the Japanese, it would "be like being in a rowing boat while my competitors whizz past in Japanese-made motor boats."

The joker in this pack is the Japanese presence in the auto and ancillary industries. The money lies in CKD exports of vehicles and components, not in technology transfers. Ancillary manufacturers are worried that auto makers will continue to buy Japanese components. Says Talwar darkly, "I feel that the Japanese want to extend CKD exports to this country as long as they can." The import duty on raw materials used to make components in the country ranges from 35 per cent to over 100 per cent, making domestic components more pricey.

Such perceptions are dismissed as "absolute nonsense" by vehicle makers. They argue that the soaring dollar, combined with freight and duty, makes shopping for components at home cheaper, and Japanese calculations could run to eventually buying components from here for their plants in other nations. Nissan, for one, may have a component buying scheme on its drawing-boards. Nevertheless, screw driver imports could continue for quite some time with the proliferation of car models, each with its own phased Indian components programme. Component manufacturers therefore plan on investing some Rs 750 crore in the industry over the next five years, excluding the amounts spent on updating know-how.

Given the time lags and the host of problems that dog them, auto makers clearly face a long haul. While the immediate future may see home-assembled Toyotas, Mitsubishis, Nissans and Peugeots on Indian roads, the outlook for their home-made counterparts is hazy now.

IDPL

Caught in a Trap

Garg: an economy problem

ITS LOCATION could not have been better: a unit that depends on alcohol as a raw material being situated in the heart of a belt that has nine distilleries which produce alcohol. Yet the Muzaffarpur unit of the public sector Indian Drugs and Pharmaceuticals Ltd (IDPL)—claimed to be the largest of its kind in Asia —now lies closed for want of alcohol. And the harassed company officials, despite repeatedly petitioning the state Government authorities in Patna, have drawn a virtual blank.

The plant had been working only intermittently since August, but October brought a virtual famine of alcohol, and the unit was finally closed. All that the excise authorities finally doled out last fortnight was 30,000 litres —less than two days' requirements for a plant that can consume six lakh bulk litres every month. And IDPL General Manager R.V. Garg said: "We have decided to keep the plant closed as it is uneconomical to run the plant with such a meagre quantity of alcohol, and then shut it down again." Understandably, Garg was short of ideas on what to do next. "When the plant was set up, the Bihar Government had assured adequate supply of alcohol, but the Government has backed out. We don't know what to do now."

The Rs 83-crore plant produces nicotinamide, nicotinic acid, mythelethyl pyridine, acetaldehyde and acetic acid, all chemicals and intermediates used to turn out drugs. And it requires 7.2 million bulk litres of alcohol every year to keep the plant running at full steam. The nine distilleries in the area produce 10 million litres, using as raw material the molasses supplied by the 26 sugar mills in north Bihar. And, the state Government had assured the Ministry of Chemicals and Fertilisers that the unit's full requirements of alcohol would be met on a priority basis. Those promises sound hollow now.

There is, of course, a genuine problem this year, since most sugar mills have faced a sugarcane shortage and therefore delayed their crushing operations. Said the Additional Secretary in the Excise Department, Syed Raza Imam Rizvi: "Our distilleries are closed. When we ourselves are facing a crisis, how can we think of IDPL?"

But if these comments point to the existence of a problem, they do not tell the whole truth. For the fact also is that the distilleries get a better price for their alcohol from the liquor manufacturers than from IDPL. The drug company pays Rs 1.55 per litre, and argues that it cannot pay more without violating the Excise Act. In comparison, the liquor manufacturers pay between Rs 1.75 and Rs 2 per litre. Result: the private distilleries have no alcohol for IDPL.

This is not the first time there has been an alcohol famine. The plant was closed for 53 days in 1981 because of a combined alcohol and power shortage.

The raw material problem may ease in the near future, once the sugarcane crushing gets under way. But clearly, this is going to be a recurring problem everytime a sugar season is ending or beginning. And since the cane crops vary sharply from year to year, the IDPL drug unit is going to continue gasping for life.

BANKING

Timely Transformation

ON THE first floor of a venerable old building on one of Bombay's main arteries, a hefty stone's throw from the glistening water of the Arabian Sea, a quiet revolution is in the making. For the last six months, a team of officers of the Union Bank of India has been working with a modified computer in which specially designed software manipulates 11,000 savings bank accounts. Customers catch only a glimpse of the Rs 1 lakh machine—they still go through the usual grind of tokens and handwritten vouchers—but after they leave the machine does the same job error-free and in approximately one-tenth of the time. By March, hopes branch manager L.C. Bangera, the machine will be doing the work on its own and the ledgers will be consigned to the filing cabinets. "There are still snags to be overcome, and we cannot trust the machine until we are 100 per cent sure that it does what it is supposed to do. But we are excited about the future."

Similar scenes and enthusiastic words are seen and heard in half-a-dozen branches of the Bank of India, the State Bank of India and Central Bank of India all over Bombay, where teams of men and women crouch over green phosphor screens, buzzing floppy disk drives and crackling printers turning out bank statements and lists of accounts. They are a pleasing foretaste of the coming transformation of Indian banking, with more than a little help from the ubiquitous and indispensable microchip.

By 1987, if the recommendations in the 68-page report on the mechanisation of the banking industry produced by an 11-member committee of the Reserve Bank of India (RBI) are implemented in full and on time, 2,500 branches with a workload of more than 1,000 transactions a day should be equipped with 10,000 electronic ledger posting machines (ELPM), a euphemism for limited function computers, 200 mini-computers in selected large branches and offices, and 25 mainframe computers at the apex level.

That is only stage I which will cost Rs 150 crore. Stage II is to be completed by 1989 and will see an additional 6,000 branches blessed with 20,000 more ELPM's and 100 more mini-computers. The manpower requirements are massive: 40,000 to 45,000 and 1,000 systems analysts and programmers. Eventually, when the mechanisation is more or less complete—no one openly calls it computerisation for fear of hurting the union's feelings—the chip will do everything from handling customer accounts on a day-to-day basis to generating weekly and monthly reports on every conceivable aspect of banking, from savings accounts to cheque clearing, and will be aided here by the parallel MICR programme (see box).

JAGANNATH DUBASHI

A Union Bank clearing room

This mammoth computerisation of Indian banking is long overdue. With over 10 million customers, more than 45,000 branches handling over Rs 75,000 crore in deposits and a daily traffic of nearly 1.5 million cheques, over 3 million transactions and one million inter-branch transfers, the Indian banking system is collapsing under the weight of its own unwieldy success. As the RBI report points out gloomily, the problems are manifold: increasing delays in the posting and balancing of various ledgers with the consequent opportunity for fraud (amply borne out by recent experiences) improperly and illegibly compiled statements of accounts, out of date passbooks, disregarded standing instructions, huge delays in clearing, yet more delays in the payment of cash cheques in places where the teller system is not in operation, revenue leakage through short-collection of interest, and so on.

Thus there is an "abundance of large volumes of outdated and unprocessed data and the scarcity of vital current data needed for the fine tuning of policy measures". All this is owing to the fact that despite the multi-dimensional growth of the economy, the banking industry has remained completely insulated from mechanisation, with the sole exception of the giant State Bank of India. Says Central Bank Chairman B.V. Sonalkar: "If we don't streamline our operations now, we'll be in deep trouble." Only 100 computers now exist in banks.

But such computerisation is only at the apex and regional levels. The path to more comprehensive computerisation was cleared in September 1983, when the All India Bank Employees Association (AIBEA), the National Confederation of Bank Employees (NCBE) and the Indian Banks Association (IBA) came to an agreement on so-called "dedicated" computers for front offices and full-fledged computers for use in the back offices.

The main objectives of the mechanisation drive are improved customer service, housekeeping and up to date data generation for management information systems. To this end the RBI committee has proposed two models. The first is the "front office" model where the ELPM with its floppy disk-based memory is placed on the counter and generates a series of reports when basic information like the amount of a deposit or a withdrawal is keyed in. Several machines can perform a number of dedicated functions: processing current and savings accounts and other daily transactions on the spot, making up the day book and the general ledger, printing pass-books at the end of the month, and so on. Says Dr Y.B. Damle, executive director, RBI, and a member of the RBI committee: "A lot of routine paper work associated with the front office will be eliminated, with the resulting bonus of accuracy and speed." The ELPM floppies can then be fed into the mini-computer to further process information and generate housekeeping data.

The second model is the back office model, with a full-fledged computer processing the transactions after they have been posted in primary ledgers. This has obvious advantages. A floppy can only accommodate about 2,000 accounts and a respectable branch would have at least 7,500. Floppies are flimsy, fragile and easily corruptible. In that context a computer getting the information from series of data entry machines and storing them in a hermetically-sealed and secure Winchester drive—which stores five times as much as a floppy—would be a safer and cheaper proposition. As manufacturer after manufacturer points out privately, the benefits in terms of both reliability, security and cost would be immediate. The experts concur. Says Dr S. Sharma of the National Institute of Bank-ing Management, which is conducting training programmes for bank officers and testing software: "On pragmatic grounds a Winchester storage system would be the best. Floppy disks can be lost, corrupted or easily damaged irretrievably with the help of a cheap magnet. They can be stolen and accounts fiddled with."

One bank has already opted for the back office system with its emphasis on better housekeeping. An exhaustive report prepared by the State Bank's computer service department headed by Dr C.R. Bapiraju, an acknowledged leader in the field, recommends that "initially only the back office's functions be mechanised", and plumps for an "intermediate technology in between the advanced electronic banking in the West and the manual systems prevalent in the bank". Thus front office function will continue to be manual—"every transaction input must be supported by a source document such as a voucher", with the "usual authorisation", and this will be batch-processed later. The report cites several reasons for this strategy: if the system fails the branch will still have the manual procedure to fall back on, the legal acceptability of magnetic media is still not clear, auditing methods for computer data are not firmly established, and last but not least checks and security are on a much firmer footing than with a purely mechanised system. About 1,400 of the bank's 6,800 branches will be covered by the mechanisation system, to be made up of data entry machines, main computers, display screens, output printers and Winchester disk storage drives.

GLEEFUL manufacturers are already totting it up. The banking mechanisation drive is a big bonanza for the 30-odd manufacturers jockeying for a slice of the cake. Says P. Dattagupta, regional manager of Wipro Information Technology Ltd: "The programme will give a big boost to both hardware and software development." Sanjiv Krishen, regional manager, International Data Management Pvt Ltd, which has just bagged a Rs 1.5-crore contract from Citibank for three systems for its Bombay branch, adds: "This is one of the most important market segments for the computer industry in the immediate future."

It is evident that it will be some time before the banking industry settles down with its intelligent new toys. But the prospective benefits are enormous. Before computers were installed in the clearing department of the Princess Street branch of the Union Bank in Bombay—it processes 9,000 cheques worth Rs 3 crore every day—"it was a nightmare", according to Chief Manager S.K. Ukani. Now five data machines run by half-a-dozen operators do the job of 20 people in a fifth of the time and with considerably greater accuracy. The branch is in the heart of Bombay's wholesale market heartland and it is a curiously endearing sight to watch brokers and merchants climb the narrow staircase, pull a cheque out of the folds of a dhoti and hand it over to man who promptly keys it into the computer's memory. The East and the West do meet sometimes.

CLEARING HOUSES

Chequemate

BY JULY this year, 80 per cent of all customer cheques are scheduled to carry a string of curiously shaped numbers along the bottom. If things work out well, those numbers will help reduce the time taken for clearing inter-city cheques from four weeks to just a day.

To the special machines that will decipher these numbers, there will be available all the relevant information relating to the account, the branch and the type of transaction. In the first phase, 1,000 branches in the four cities (which handle over half of all clearing traffic) will be equipped with encoding machines, while another 80 sorter-sorter machines at large branches and selected clearing houses will sort out the cheques. The time spent in the sheer drudgery of processing millions of cheques will be cut drastically. The total cost of the first phase: $ 5 million (Rs 6.5 crore).

The need for this long-delayed step came from a visit to the Bombay Bankers' Clearing House of the RBI. On February 5, 1985, this cleared 1,25,168 cheques worth Rs 207.29 crore in the first of two daily clearings. The clearing house has 83 member banks and processes Rs 250 crore of cheque transactions every day. The only part of this gigantic task which is computerised is the settlement section, where a computer linked to a dozen terminals works out, 10 minutes after the data has been fed, how much each bank owes to the others. Earlier, this operation was entirely and exasperatingly manual and used to take all of six hours.

But everything else is still entirely and exasperatingly manual. The result is that at the 532 clearing houses in the country, clearing an intra-city cheque can take four days and clearing an inter-city one more than four weeks. No wonder then that the size of the 'float' in a system which handles anything between one million and 1.5 million cheques a day is an unacceptable 20 per cent of the total amount. The RBI working group's report on cheque processing says mournfully: "Customer service is suffering tremendously and to say the least, the bank's performance is rather sub-optimal in this area of work." The solution now being adopted is cheques with magnetic ink character recognition (MICR).

MICR will cut down the swelling float because, coupled with an inter-city centralised clearing system that the RBI is putting finishing touches to, clearing time between the four main cities is expected to be cut down to a day: "Overnight service", as Dr Y.B. Damle, executive director, RBI, and the moving force behind the plan, puts it. For another the cost of clearing a cheque will be slashed from the present Rs 6 to less than Rs 2. Human error will be reduced to a minimum.

There is some doubt about whether the tight schedule will actually be honoured. The tenders went out last month. Only one or two banks actually have MICR cheques in circulation to find out how they stand the grind. No bank actually has an encoder, even for trial. Some measure of the way things have dragged on can be had from the fact that the Damle report came out 18 months ago. But with the volume of cheques increasing at the rate of 11 per cent every year, bankers have no choice but to pull up their socks and get on with it.

TYRES

Taking a Spin

IT'S BEEN a long, downhill bumpy ride—and the bumps are showing. At least two of the 12 industry majors are in the red, three are on the borderline, and five others operate on slim profit margins. One has piled up losses of over Rs 23 crore. Another has been off the dividend list for years, has not provided for depreciating assets, and total losses exceed its share capital. Conceded S.S. Siddhu, secretary to the Department of Industrial Development till he moved over last fortnight to the Civil Aviation Ministry: "Tyre companies are not doing well."

So if the tyre companies are hollering, they have cause to. Longer-wearing "radial" tyres and better tyre retreading processes have worn down sales in the tyre replacement market, which is the mainstay of the industry's business. This has combined with plummeting sales to a troubled road transport industry and excess production capacities to send the industry skidding off the highway. Eleven big firms, excluding the producers of two and three-wheeler tyres, can in theory produce about 53 lakh more tyres than the estimated demand this year of 73 lakh tyres. Some of this capacity may exist only on paper, but with 26 per cent of the industry's total capacity unutilised, surplus capacities are now dirty words in the industry's lexicon.

Things may now get worse. The Government has issued letters of intent for fresh capacities of some 90 lakh tyres, while some existing companies have launched expansion schemes because the exchequer reimburses them half their total investment in plant and machinery. So excess capacity could become a still bigger problem. As a result the industry as a whole is up in arms.

The Automotive Tyre Manufacturers' Association (ATMA) which represents the heavyweights of the industry, has been fighting a rearguard battle to scuttle the licence applications of Larsen & Toubro, Nirlon, and the Birlas' Kesoram Industries to make 30 lakh tyres in all. And last fortnight, industry executives pointed grimly to the experience of tyre companies world-wide. Michelin and Dunlop are in hot water, Ceat has gone into receivership, Mansfield has folded up, and Firestone has pulled out of Asia, Africa and Europe—all victims of industry-wide over-capacity. Says V.C. Vishwanathan, vice-president in charge of marketing at JK Industries: "The same situation could be repeated here." What is immediately worrying industry men is production capacities in the next five years. They argue that capacities by 1989-90 will vastly exceed what is required.

The big question raised last fortnight was: is the industry crying wolf? Some government officials voiced suspicions that the industry wants to restrict the entry of new firms and revert to the seller's market of the early 1970s. Says an official in the directorate-general of trade and development (DGTD): "Tyre companies want to be in a monopoly position." Others too contest the industry position that excess capacity is being ushered in. In fact, the draft report of the Industry Ministry's working group on tyres and tubes predicts a 36 lakh shortfall in capacity by 1989-90.

Tyres cascading: excess capacity

The working group's methods have come under fire from the tyre industry in three areas. The industry argues that the annual demand growth figures for autos and hence for tyres have been pitched too high (over 20 per cent for cars); that the installed capacity of over 50 small units has been ignored because DGTD has no data on them; and that the rapidly growing two-wheeler market segment has been clubbed together with other sectors to distort overall growth estimates. Vishwanathan, who represents ATMA on the committee, says that the group also overlooked the possibility of tyre companies resorting to the 5 per cent automatic capacity increase provision and the 25 per cent cushion that is allowed over and above the licensed capacity. Together with the 210 lakh capacity of the 50-plus small units, this would take industry capacity to a whopping 375 lakh in five years—a surplus of 104.14 lakh if the companies operate at 85 per cent efficiency. But if the Government errs on one side, the industry estimate does on the other. For the assumption that all firms will necessary plump for automatic capacity expansion has not so far been borne out by past experience.

The industry's case really rests on the capacity of the 50-odd unregistered units. A DGTD official believes that of the 210 lakh capacity attributed by the industry, 200 lakh exists only on paper and serves only to pre-empt others from entering the industry. Thus a proposal was floated at a meeting of the working group last December, to compel those companies to come under licensing regulations.

But the DGTD estimate of fictitious capacity may be too high, as many firms that are faring well in the market are not registered with it. For instance, Metro Tyres claims a turnover of Rs 30 crore, and regularly advertises on television. And Wearwell Tyre and Tube has applied for ATMA membership and has a technical collaboration agreement with a US firm. Notes M.R. Kulkarni, joint adviser in the Planning Commission's industry division and a member of the committee: "Unregistered capacity seems to be the problem. There may be some truth in the industry's allegation."

But other government officials argue that higher exports and lower costs may pull tyre companies out of the trough. Exports will shoot up to Rs 45 crore this year from Rs 12 crore last year. the 66 per cent excise on tyres may cut in the next budget and lower tyre prices could push up flagging sales. But the rising export curve may dip once closed US plants reopen to produce specialised tyres for trucks, and an excise cut may not help much if the demand for tyres is price inelastic. And unless the issue of small companies' capacities is resolved, the industry could be spinning along to harder times.

It takes the bumps and potholes with care and respect for the rider. It reacts instantly to the brakes. And I love the way it comes to such a stable halt. My husband says it's because of a new suspension that transfers the impact of sudden braking, from the front wheel to the rear.

Runglee Rungliot

THE LEGENDARY DARJEELING TEA

Nothing else is quite the same

Centuries ago, there was a Buddhist monk, who travelled far and wide in search of the best tea Darjeeling could offer. He found it finally in a tea so exquisite, that he proclaimed, 'Runglee Rungliot'—Thus far and no further! The ultimate in tea quality had been found.

From the mists of legend comes this exquisite Darjeeling Tea, brought to you by Duncans and named after the legend.... Runglee Rungliot.

TAX LAW

Pandora's Box

THE ISSUES involved seem arcane, but the verdict is rocking the corporate world. Hundreds of companies may have to hand over a total of Rs 150 crore to Rs 200 crore plus hefty interest amounts when the taxman comes calling, triggering off cash flow problems for the more imprudent. Those strapped for cash may have to head for the banks hat in hand. And firms could stand indicted for breaking the law.

That Pandora's box was opened by a landmark Supreme Court ruling last fortnight that lays to rest a 15-year-old controversy. The court held that in the given context the capital employed by companies excludes borrowings—a rude shock to firms that had believed the contrary and claimed tax holidays by calculating deductions as a percentage of net worth plus borrowings. Expectedly, Nani Palkhivala, chairman of Associated Cement Companies Ltd and principal lawyer for the host of petitioners led by Lohia Machines Ltd, was critical of the judgement: "On well settled principles of law which have been reaffirmed by the Supreme Court itself in earlier cases, the latest majority judgement is insupportable in law."

Unfortunately, so ambiguous is the term "capital employed" that the judges were able to quote Palkhiwala's contentions right back at him. The judgement reads cuttingly: "It will thus be seen that there is no unanimity amongst accountants and lawyers in regard to the question whether 'capital employed' necessarily includes long-term borrowings."

The law in question is Section 80 (J) of the Income Tax Act. It provides that new undertakings, hotels or ships can deduct 6 per cent of the capital employed, and private companies 7.5 per cent, from their taxable income. This statutory law has to be read along with Rule 7 (A) of the Income Tax Rules which narrows the law's ambit. The Central Board of Direct Taxes (CBDT) rule defines capital employed as the net worth of the company and excludes borrowings. While giving their verdict four of the five judges on the bench ruled that the CBDT was justified in defining it that way. The problem of course was that for 19 years the definition had been quite different and no one had said anything. It was the change by a government order that made the companies go to court.

Estimates of the money at stake range from a financial daily's Rs 170 crore to a weekly's Rs 400 crore. A pointer could be Finance Ministry figures which show that nearly 2,300 corporate and non-corporate assessees are disputing government tax claims of about Rs 112 crore for the 1970-80 decade and high-growth companies which have sunk fat sums into expansion or greenfield ventures in the last 10 years will be hit unless

"The latest majority judgement is insupportable in law."

other tax shelters are available. In theory, a firm that had invested Rs 100 crore in new projects, 65 per cent of which was borrowed, could now be slapped with a Rs 5 crore tax demand.

Big borrowers like shipping companies and hotels should logically face the biggest crunch. For shipping companies are allowed to raise up to six times their equity as loans, as against the norm of two times for other companies. But shipping firms are sinking in an ocean of red ink, and the court ruling affects only those with black ink on their ledgers. Thus Great Eastern Shipping Company, perhaps the only shipping firm that is making profits will be badly hit. Says Vasanth Sheth, chairman of Great Eastern which was one of the petitioners, "This decision will impose on us an additional burden of Rs 1 crore which comes to a substantial 2 per cent of our net worth." And Moiz Pancha, general manager, finance and accounts of Indian Hotels Company, puts his company's arrears at over Rs 57 lakh and the hotel industry's liability at about Rs 4 crore.

A number of the top 100 corporations have not stashed away money to meet additional tax demands. Explains tax consultant O.P. Vaish: "Unlike in excise cases, the liability was not expected to arise because five out of six high courts had ruled in favour of companies." But many believe that the far-sighted outnumber the imprudent. Notes H.R. Gupta, vice-president, fibre project, Straw Products Ltd, a JK group firm: "Most companies have been making a provision after the Section 80 (J) amendment, except those that subsequently started incurring losses." Thus Lohia Machines has a tax liability of only Rs 25 lakh for deductions claimed from 1976-77 to 1978-79 because it switched to conservative accounting practices when the law was amended. Other firms had opted for safer tax shelters. The resourceful Reliance Textile Industries claimed last fortnight that it would not be affected because it used other provisions to trim its tax liabilities to the bone.

Some in industry are also haunted by the spectre of having violated the law. Going by Section 80 (J), firms arrived at higher profit and dividend figures than entitled to. The Government is unlikely to prosecute, but with dividends to be paid out of profits and not capital, that could be a breach of company law.

Last fortnight however, executives were charging the Government with breach of faith and arguing that the law should have been made clear. Says Vinay Kumar Jain, chief executive, corporate planning of Lohia Machines: "It's like giving a man a ladder and jerking it away once he has climbed a few steps."

The point is well taken. The Government could have withdrawn the incentive in 1975, when the Calcutta High Court ruled against it. And the rule itself is clumsily worded. The Public Accounts Committee (PAC) of Parliament castigated CBDT in its 75th report. Referring to a Rule 19 (A)-related case won by Indian Oil Corporation against the income tax authorities in the Bombay High Court in 1973, it pointed out that the rule was faultily framed. In this particular case, if an assessee owned four undertakings the combined debts would be subtracted from the capital employed in a single undertaking. The CBDT chairman admitted to the committee that this was a lapse on CBDT's part. Still, "the department did not take the opportunity of making suitable changes in the working of Rule 19 (A) for making the meaning clear and unambiguous".

Meanwhile, with the curtain rung down on a cliff-hanging tax drama, the business world was predicting that new projects would go on stream with other tax incentives around, and reconciling itself to the court's verdict.

COIR INDUSTRY

Tied up in Knots

THE COIR industry in Kerala seems to have tied itself up in knots. What was once a flourishing business that provided the major source of income to four lakh people, is today beset by a host of tangled problems. The export of coir and coir products, which brought in Rs 30 crore in foreign exchange, has been declining steadily. And more than half the coir factories in Alleppey, a picturesque coastal town that is the centre of the world coir trade, lie closed and silent.

From an average of 56,000 tonnes of coir yarn in the late 1950s to an average of 29,000 tonnes in the early 1970s, exports have crashed still lower in recent years, averaging barely 15,000 tonnes in the 1980s. The drop in the quantity exported has been a staggering 72 per cent, and exports in 1983-84 were barely two-thirds of what was achieved five years ago.

The versatile fibre, extracted from coconut husk and used for making such varied products as ropes, brushes, doormats, carpets, mattresses and cushions, is classified as a premier industrial hard fibre. But a combination of forces has brought about a steady decline, including a sharp drop in raw material availability, a consequent surge in input prices, the failure to mechanise, and a confused and counter-productive government policy regulating the raw material supply.

Coconut production in the state has been hit by a severe drought and a virulent virus, the root wilt disease. The annual harvest has consequently fallen from 4 billion nuts in the early 1970s to barely 2 billion now, and adversely affected virtually every coconut-based industry in the state.

The downstream effects are close to catastrophic. "The single biggest contributor to the coir industry's dismal showing is an almost 400 per cent increase in the price of raw materials," says Ravi Karunakaran, one of the country's leading exporters of coir products. Adds Sreedharan Nair, president of the Travancore Coir Mats and Matting Manufacturers Association and manager of Aspinwall Exporters: "Every day I come to the office hoping that there is no new order on the telex. Because even if there is an order, we cannot execute it due to the raw material shortage."

Matters have not been helped by the fact that all efforts to modernise the industry have met with stiff resistance from both the Government and the labour unions, on the grounds that this will lead to labour displacement. The method of producing coir at present is both laborious and time-consuming. The majority of the half a dozen panels that have gone into the industry's ills have favoured mechanisation, especially in the post-yarn stages, but this was bitterly opposed by Alleppey's then CPI(M) parliamentarian Susheela Gopalan, on the plea that traditionally coir has been a cottage industry, with lakhs of people depending on it for a living.

A coir matting loom in Alleppey: archaic equipment

One result has been that India's traditional coir rival, Sri Lanka, has moved ahead with revolutionary pre-crushing machines. Chinese rush mats have also become a serious competitor in the world market owing to the fact that these are cheaper than coir products.

Many private exporters in Kerala also blame state government policy for their problems. The usual target of attack is the Government's licensing procedures and the restrictions placed on the inter-district movement of husk. Both were designed to help the communist-run coir cooperatives get their husk requirements at reasonable prices, with the Husk Control Order (HCO) being implemented in 1973 by the then CPI industry minister T.V.Thomas.

But the Government-controlled price of husk now is only Rs 100 per thousand husks, while the open market rate is as high as Rs 380. Not surprisingly, the cooperatives do not get as much husk as they need. And because of the restrictions on taking husk across a district border, a lot of the available husk is simply burnt as domestic fuel. So while the HCO's objectives may have been laudable, all that it has really achieved is the creation of an artificial shortage on top of the already existing scarcity of husks. And Ravi Karunakaran has no doubt in his mind that the high husk prices are clearly a creation of the HCO.

With the situation getting from bad to worse, however, and faced with the prospect of the rug being literally pulled out from under its feet, the state Government is finally having second thoughts on the HCO. Industry Minister E. Ahmed promised at a workshop held in Cochin recently that he would introduce liberalisations and a more practicable system of levy procurement. But this could be easier said than done. For the Kerala State Cooperative Coir Marketing Federation is just as determined to stop any such move. Said Thachady Prabhakaran, Congress(I) MLA and president of the federation: "We will not allow the Government to scrap the HCO, as that will kill the cooperatives." Prabhakaran in fact argues that there is a good market within India for coir products, and that this can be suitably exploited. The federation, which has about 450 cooperatives under its umbrella, has set up 36 offices in different states to popularise coir products.

Clearly, there are going to be serious hurdles in the way of any major revision of the Government's policy for the coir industry. And what exactly will be achieved eventually remains to be seen. But unless the Government takes some concrete steps, the coir industry could be in for some lean times. —SREEDHAR PILLAI

Damaging Discount

BILL discounting is a common practice in business circles. Most commercial bills have to be paid 90 to 180 days in the future. And a company that does not want to wait for its money can 'sell' the bill to another company in return for instant cash, minus the discounting fee of around 15 per cent. For additional surety, the bills are often 'co-accepted' by a commercial bank, which for a small fee, stands guarantee that the company which is discounting the bill will get its money.

Hundreds of crores of rupees change hands every week in such transactions. And as in every other kind of financial give and take, there is the possibility that the money will, sometimes, go astray. Last month it did, and caught in the embarrassing glare of publicity were the Central Bank of India, the Kinetic Engineering Company of Pune (turnover: Rs 54 crore), and the sum of Rs 2.23 crore.

On a Thursday early last month, Arun Firodia, a director of Kinetic, was called to his office in Pune to find a team of officials from the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI). The officials politely asked him to hand over a list of documents. These related to six bills that Kinetic had discounted from two companies, Technica International Engineering of Bombay and Karimbil Industries of Bangalore. The 180-day bills were to have matured on December 31, and Kinetic had expected to receive Rs 2.23 crore from the Central Bank of India. Instead, the bank had filed a case with the police charging that the bills allegedly for materials supplied were fake, and that Firodia and the other parties were involved in a fraud.

Firodia was to be a guest of the CBI for the next few days. He even bedded down in the Bureau's Bombay offices that night, unable to attend a nephew's wedding in Delhi. Nobody was sure if Firodia was under arrest, and according to one senior officer, the CBI "overreacted". Firodia himself laughs off the arrest as a "misunderstanding".

But there is more to the case than misunderstandings. According to the bank, the six bills in question had been co-accepted by the branch manager of its Napean Sea Road branch although he had no authority to do so, and that this had been done in fraudulent collusion with Firodia and the companies that originally issued the bills.

Firodia argues that it is his money that is involved, not the bank's, that he had taken the co-acceptance at face value without knowing that the branch manager had overstepped his authority, and that the discounting of the six bills had been nothing more than routine transactions. Kinetic has been flush with funds for some time because of deposits collected from people in the queue for its mopeds. It had used this money to earn a good return by discounting 491 bills worth Rs 20 crore in the six months till December.

The big question is whether Arun Firodia is involved in the fraud, as the Central Bank alleges, or whether bank officials were the culprits, as Firodia charges.

Firodia also points out a series of oddities in support of his innocence: the companies that sold their bills to Kinetic, he had later found out, had opened their accounts in the Napean Sea Road branch only a day before Kinetic paid up after discounting the bills, and the money was withdrawn the following day—not through the branch but through the regional office of the bank. Did this suggest that others in the bank were also involved? It is also alleged that the companies that initially issued the bills were "insubstantial".

So the fact of fraud cannot be denied. The big question however is whether Kinetic was involved in the fraud, as the bank alleges, or whether bank officials were the culprits, as Firodia charges. In defence of their stand, Kinetic spokesmen point out that the Central Bank has had over 400 cases of fraud in the last year, and that they had no means of knowing that a Central Bank branch manager did not have the authority to co-accept bills (branch managers in other banks do). Also, the bank had initially not charged Kinetic with being an accomplice. This, the spokesmen say, was an afterthought designed to protect the bank from legal action.

From the bank's side, the story is somewhat different. Bank officials say they first smelt a rat around September, after a broker tipped them off on the subject. D.K. Contractor, general manager of the bank, explains that Firodia was then invited over and given the facts: that a bill co-accepted by a branch manager is not valid if not countersigned by his superior, and that the Napean Sea Road branch was in any case not authorised to co-accept bills. Six weeks later, the bank wrote to Kinetic that "we are not liable and have assumed no liabilities or obligations on the said instruments". Kinetic fired back with a firm riposte: "We deny that the acceptance and the accompanying documents are not genuine. Your contentions are unbusinesslike, immoral and illegal and are detrimental to the reputation of and faith in banking institutions." Central Bank wrote back through its lawyer, charging Kinetic with being in collusion with its branch manager, and the "drawer" and "acceptor" of the bills, and said that the matter was being referred to the CBI.

Firodia now says he will answer only in court. And whatever the truth of the matter, it will be some time before the clouds clear. Meanwhile, the affair has set off tremors in business circles. Says one industrialist: "If the basic trust which underlies these deals is broken, where do we go?" That question is doubly relevant for Kinetic, which had initially invested large sums of surplus cash on the inter-corporate market, only to lose out when a large borrowing company collapsed. Kinetic had then turned to the bill discounting market, believing this to be a safer bet. But the company's problems of plenty continue.

THE OUTLOOK for industry, especially for manufacturing and power, appears encouraging, with a healthy increase last month. Money supply registered a sharp increase, in spite of a credit slowdown by commercial banks. While share prices were buoyant over the last fortnight, bullion prices were stationary showing a declining long term trend.

All data are seasonally adjusted. Current trends are computed on the basis of the last six months' data to which a regression is fitted.

Relatively steep increases in the prices of food and primary goods led to a spurt of 0.4% in wholesale prices last fortnight.

Industrial production accelerated to record 0.8 per cent growth in October, well above trend, owing to a spurt in manufacturing output.

Manufacturing output rose nearly 1 per cent in October, due to increases in electrical machinery, textiles, chemicals and rubber products.

Sharp expansion of RBI credit to the government contributed to a 1.9 per cent growth in money supply last fortnight.

Bank credit to firms was up 0.5 per cent last fortnight, a little below the long term trend, indicating some financial austerity.

Optimism in the share market is indicated by a 1.7 per cent rise in share prices last fortnight, especially in cement, tea, paper and textiles.

Power generation registered a surge of 2.2 per cent last month, accelerating significantly over previous months.

Bullion prices recorded no change last fortnight except for a sharp peak in the middle, well above the declining long term trend.

THE MARKETS

Boom Time

THE STOCK market is obviously very pleased with the way things are going and demonstrates its love affair with a daily mark-up on the stock exchange tote. The Financial Express index has gained 6 per cent since the New Year, or more than 1 per cent a week. At this rate, the index might touch 250 if not more by year end, which means that shares that are now being quoted around 25 will go up to about 45, and those around 30 might touch 50. This seems too good to be true, but then who would have thought that Larsen & Toubro, which has been marking time around 70 for months right up to polling day, would have crossed, as it nearly did last week, the century mark in less than five weeks?

It is being said that all the cash that used to go into bullion speculation is now finding its way into stock exchanges, which may be true up to a point but does not explain the runaway boom. There are reports that the non-residents are active again—rumours specifically mention Larsen & Toubro in this connection—and there are also reports about take-overs. The R.P. Goenka group is said to have cornered shares in Bayer (India) through one of their men in Dunlop in which the group has acquired a substantial holding. The Bayer scrip rose from Rs 322 on January 2 to Rs 395 on February 5, a 25 per cent rise in less than five weeks. But Bayer is not alone. A number of companies are swimming with the tide—Blow Plast up from Rs 39 to Rs 55, Hindustan Cocoa from Rs 58 to Rs 80 and Ranbaxy from Rs 49 to Rs 67, and all since January 1.

Is it just a flash in the pan or is the market trying to tell us something we don't know? According to one report current in Bombay, the budget is expected to be presented on March 15, not just a vote-on-account but a full-fledged budget. The fact that it is being held over until after the assembly elections probably means a heavy dose of taxes, but those in the know say that it may not be so. The Government is keen to make a good impression on its newest constituency—private business, which may get away lightly this time. The screw will be on the public sector which will be asked to generate its own resources.

This is the time of the year when blue chips should be given a wide berth and attention focused on the not so big chips which rarely make headlines. There are a number of such scrips and some of them are doing pretty well. Some of these smaller companies are being taken over, either formally or otherwise, by bigger groups who have the capacity to turn them around and put them to good use. Quite a few are being quoted below par which makes them even more attractive. With a little bit of luck, you may have real winners on your hand.

These days the task of choosing a computer is as complex as the number of options the market offers. But you've got a choice: work your way through the maze of product claims or come to the No 1: WIPRO. Here's the case of a leading magazine publishing house which made the right choice.

The challenge: Co-ordinating and managing distribution, sales and outstandings, with 75,000 subscribers and 1,200 agents countrywide.

The solution: WIPRO's custom-built totally integrated Distribution-cum-Subscription package run on a powerful WIPRO mini-computer.

The outcome: The WIPRO solution maximised the working efficiencies of Production, Distribution, Circulation and Accounts departments—monitoring operations right up to final despatches by rail, road and air. Your problem was as complex as this, wouldn't you be concerned about the right move, too?

Break away to the No 1 in mini-computers. In 1983-84, with almost twice the sales of No 2, WIPRO captured 30% of the market in mini-computers. An achievement confirmed in a survey by Data Quest*, where WIPRO emerged as the undisputed leader.

And what's behind WIPRO's No 1 position?

WIPRO's support service. WIPRO can offer customer services countrywide, through a well-planned network of offices. Backed by a qualified and experienced team of hardware and software specialists and service engineers.

WIPRO's customer interaction. A close working relationship with users helps WIPRO develop customized solutions.

WIPRO's product range. Today WIPRO has the widest range of mini-computers with features such as upgradability to meet a user's growing needs. The software developed by WIPRO is compatible across the entire range of its systems.

WIPRO's R&D. Complementing the state-of-the-art inputs in WIPRO's R&D environment is a team of experienced, qualified and dedicated personnel. Helping pioneer and develop systems with the leading edge of technology.

WIPRO's modern factory. WIPRO's factory in Mysore has the most modern manufacturing and testing equipment. The Fairchild ATE, for example—the only one of its kind in India.

BANGLADESH

Depressing Dilemma

THE JINXED parliamentary elections in Bangladesh, postponed twice over since President H.M. Ershad toppled a civilian government on March 24, 1982, and took control under martial law, are headed for yet another abortive start. Last month, the country's election commission announced April 6 as the date for the general election to the 300-member parliament and Ershad followed it up by partially restoring fundamental rights. But the opposition parties have given a thumbs down signal to the overture until martial law is withdrawn.

Over the last fortnight, the atmosphere in Dhaka changed from one of hope into despondency as it became clear that the martial law authorities in fact wanted the opposition to play the game according to the rules set by themselves. After a brief lull in the movements following Ershad's announcement, the streets were bristling again with angry processions. And, to top it all, Sheikh Hasina Wajed, daughter of the slain President Sheikh Mujibur Rahman, and president of the Awami League, ordered a fresh round of "non-cooperation movement" in the country beginning this fortnight.

Both the 15-party alliance led by Hasina and the seven-party combination headed by Begum Khaleda Zia, chairperson of the Bangladesh Nationalist Party (BNP), have declared that they would not participate in the polls unless Ershad conceded their common five-point demand, the topmost of which is the abolition of martial law. In an interview with the BBC, Khaleda said: "Ershad says he has freed his cabinet of people who have links with political parties. But he maintains his own link with the Jana Dal, which is his own party. We can say that by making these announcements he is bluffing and misguiding the people."

However, Ershad has conceded some of the demands of the opposition already, the firm announcement of the poll date being one of them. He also announced earlier that even though he intended to go back to the constitution suspended in 1982, which provided for a presidential election before elections to the parliament, he would make a departure from it to accommodate the opposition viewpoint and hold the parliamentary elections first. He kept his word at that. In addition:

- the part-military and part-Jana Dal cabinet was dissolved on January 15 to be replaced by a mixed cabinet of armymen and completely non-party civilians the special martial law courts were abolished and the posts of district and sub-zonal martial law authorities were scrapped;
- fundamental rights were restored (with some restrictions) and the writ of the High Court division of the Supreme Court re-established.

"Tell me if there could be any stronger token of his intention to civilianise the administration that the President could give," asks a spokesman of the Bangladesh High Commission in New Delhi angrily. But the Opposition sees a trap in the President's announcement because, even after the new parliament gets sworn in, Ershad will continue to preside over it because that is what the suspended constitution, given effect by the late Zia-ur Rahman, Khaleda's husband, lays down.

However, it may not be easy for the two women to stall it in case Ershad means to go ahead with it this time. Hasina recently told a meeting of Chhatra League, the students' wing of her party: "If we don't allow the election, there is no way that they can take place. There cannot be polls if people do not participate in it." But both Khaleda and Hasina are under pressure from powerful groups within their parties who want the civilian process to begin somehow at any cost. During the past year, many of Hasina's compatriots, the most notable among them being Korban Ali, a former minister under her father, have walked away to join Ershad's Jana Dal, more out of sheer frustration than any love for the President.

The pro-election sentiments are even more pronounced in the BNP where a party caucus, led by Shah Azizur Rahman, senior vice-chairman of the party and former prime minister under Zia-ur Rahman, recently met and declared its intention to participate in the elections. Shah Azizur Rahman had with him three of his former cabinet colleagues in the ministry. It is common knowledge in the party that the chairperson and the senior vice-chairman are not on speaking terms. Even some of Khaleda's recent public rallies were attacked by the other group.

Faced with these internal problems, both Hasina and Khaleda are now in a deep political dilemma. Even though the election tempo builds up in Bangladesh, a rigid stand by these two leaders on the issue may lead to the initiative passing entirely into the hands of Ershad and his Jana Dal. Sources close to Hasina maintain that it will amount to "going against the prevailing mood" of the country, leading to an alienation that may be difficult to bridge later. But to agree to Ershad's proposal also means investing the martial law regime with a degree of legitimacy where the main plank of the Opposition, and the Awami League in particular, is an unmitigated struggle against the political ambition of the military.

SEWA

Working For Women

FOR THE poor women of Ahmedabad, moving out of their familiar little kitchens, however drab, to the perils of the market-place is no gesture of liberation. It is forced by sheer economic necessity. But once there, they flounder helplessly in what is aggressively a man's world. Thus, Saroj, who was allotted a place in a residential colony in the city, was quickly edged out to a filthy spot next to a garbage dump by an aggressive male trader. No one spoke for her. Jivi has been selling old clothes in the old city for 15 years, her place well away from the road and in no one's way. But she got booked for traffic obstruction when she refused to pay the beat policeman his "gratification" fee. The numerous trips to the court and the fines she had to pay depleted her meagre profit margin.

The small tragedies of Saroj and Jivi might be too commonplace to make news. But increasingly, the harassed women of Ahmedabad and Gujarat have to their surprise discovered a champion in SEWA, the Self-Employed Women's Association. This feisty organisation has so successfully battled against injustice to women that a SEWA identity card bravely flourished before a market-place bully's face has become a talisman against harassment. Kamala Dadage, 27, who was once merely the battered wife of a textile labourer but is now a group leader with SEWA, organising beedi workers, says: "Self-employed women are not going to be docile any more. We have to shout to be heard." These cries are being heard outside the country as well. Two months ago, an announcement from Stockholm said SEWA's head Ela Bhatt had been chosen for the Right to Livelihood Prize to be given this December. The crowning award came when she was conferred the Padma Shri last month.

Set up in 1900 by a group of intellectuals in Sweden, the Right to Livelihood Prize honours and supports work in the most vital areas of human endeavour where dedicated people are at work to find practical and replicable solutions to real problems. But this award, which carries a sum of $ 15,000 (Rs. 1.8 lakh) is not the first for Bhatt and SEWA: in 1977, the soft-spoken, khadi-clad Bhatt was selected for the prestigious Magsaysay Award. And quite deservedly, too: for the past few years, the 15,000-member organisation, which is aided by OXFAM, the Ford Foundation, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Government of India has been engaged in trail-blazing work among the women of Gujarat. Now its reach extends beyond the state in Bhopal, Lucknow, Mithila, Bhagalpur, Singbhum, Munger and Delhi.

When it began, SEWA was a part of the Textile Labour Association (TLA). But in 1981, serious differences between TLA and Bhatt who had joined it in 1967 forced a split. Bhatt was asked to "leave the premises and take SEWA with her". Starting over again was hard but it had its rewards. With a new organisational framework, SEWA became independent. The change took effect when SEWA became more adventurous and aggressive in its fight for a better deal for women. Women handcart-pullers, potters, vegetable vendors, beedi and agarbatti workers, scrap pickers and bamboo workers all found a faithful friend in SEWA.

"If men are around, women will not participate freely and due to social conditioning, withdraw. Then our whole point would be lost."

ELA BHATT

The case of the vegetable vendors of Manek Chowk in downtown Ahmedabad is typical. The toplawalis, as these women are called, have traditionally been selling vegetables in front of the market, at a lower price than the stall-owners in the [illegible]. This did not make them popular with the stall-owners, but in addition they had to contend with police harassment as well. If they didn't pay up, they faced the prospect of having their vegetables crushed under police boots, and being insulted by the men in uniform. The helpless women turned to SEWA in desperation. But its appeals to the police and the municipal corporation had no effect: the women were banned from sitting where for years they had carried out their modest trade.

Furious at the city fathers' lack of sympathy, an enraged Bhatt walked into Manek Chowk with a brigade of toplawalis and told them to spread their wares out before, defying police orders. For a couple of days, the policemen seemed daunted by Bhatt's presence on the scene but soon resumed their harassment. Bhatt then called upon well-known Bombay lawyer Indira Jaisingh to help. She filed a writ petition in the Supreme Court challenging the ban, and won the case for SEWA early this year. The court directed the municipal corporation and the police to formulate a scheme in consultation with SEWA to accommodate the women vendors.

If this case taught SEWA that tougher strategies than mere persuasiveness were necessary, the case of the quilt workers showed them the kind of ruthless opposition they would have to contend with. Hundreds of poor women in the city are engaged in making quilt covers from scrap material discarded by the textile mills. As many as 60 pieces of scrap are laboriously stitched together by these women to make just one cover. For this, the quilt-makers pay them a paltry 50 paise. When the women tried to protest and asked for a higher price, 40 of them were sacked. SEWA stepped in to help, and it has secure orders for quilt covers from villages around Ahmedabad in an attempt to ensure employment to the poor women. But the wealthy quilt merchants scarised the women and tried to drive them out of the scene.

Undaunted, SEWA took them on squarely on their own home ground—it opened a shop right in the middle of a chain of shops owned by the quilt merchants of Dariapur in Ahmedabad. Not surprisingly, it is doing very well. So is Sahara, the quilt-makers' cooperative organised by SEWA, although at the moment the closure of textile mills has made it difficult to obtain raw material.

Quite apart from the financial gains made by the women, these ventures have given them a healthy sense of self-confidence and dignity. Says Bilquish Bano, 43, assistant manager of the quilt shop who was just a scrap sorter a few years ago: "SEWA helped me get a new life." Other women find that their new status has earned them respect. "My position within the family has changed after I joined SEWA," says Chandu Papubhai. "Before, if the food was not well cooked or the house was dirty, my husband and other menfolk would insult me and beat me. But now they see how much respect I have outside and talk to me as an equal."

THE ORGANISATION has also helped women artisans with fresh ideas and innovations which have made their work more popular and profitable. For instance, women engaged in making brooms and baskets from bamboo in Ahmedabad found their profits stagnating. SEWA hired craftsmen from Tripura to train its members, and they soon began turning out anything from fancy lampshades to bamboo chairs. A similar training programme helped women block printers refine their skills.

They were taught aggressive marketing techniques to even out the odds in a market where screen printing is killing the ancient art of hand printing. The results are evident in the handsome profits Aabudana, the block printers' cooperative is making.

But the organisation's most impressive achievement is the SEWA Cooperative Bank which has an amazingly high recovery rate of loans: 98 per cent. Begun in 1974 to help members save and acquire loans, it proceeded to do both in a most efficient fashion. The secret was that the bank doggedly pursued the cases of all loanees, maintaining a dossier on their background, limitations and job situations. This helped the bank officials to understand why repayment was delayed and what could be done to set it right. For instance, if a member took a loan to buy an amber charkha, she was also given instructions on how to organise herself professionally and maintain accounts.

Thus despite the fact that most loans were given without guarantees because the beneficiaries were poor, the bank made a profit of Rs 2.8 lakh in 1983-84. It now has a working capital of Rs 71.89 lakh and deposits of over Rs 68.3 lakh.

The bank was set up in 1973, when 4,000 women contributed a share capital of Rs 10 each to establish the bank, and the relief of having a bank of their own was soon apparent. "It has enabled members to come out of the clutches of private money-lenders," says Usha Jumani, managing director of the bank and a dedicated SEWA worker. "As they are no more indebted to traders and middlemen, their bargaining power has improved."

After 1977, SEWA began moving out into the rural areas where it was more needed. Its effort to organise women labourers in unions and get them to agitate for minimum wages broke down when big farmers and landlords terrorised the peasants. SEWA was forced to backtrack and teach women alternate skills. Thus 20 villages around Ahmedabad were chosen for the programme which taught women carpentry, blacksmithy, weaving, tailoring, spinning, dairying and the like. Six women's dairy cooperatives were begun, but two subsequently had to close down and the rest are faring badly. The experiment taught SEWA the sobering lesson that vested interests are stronger at the moment than the illiterate women who tried to run their own cooperatives.

Failure is not new for SEWA, but then, neither is success. It has had a measure of both, but with patience and determination, flagging spirits and enthusiasm have been made to revive miraculously. "We may not have succeeded as much as we want to, but our consolation is that we are slowly creating an awareness among women. Change takes time," says a philosophical Anila Dholakia, chief of the rural wing of the orgainsation.

Dholakia is right. The interest and awareness created by SEWA has led even men to apply for membership. And Bhatt agrees that if social change is to be effected, men will also have to be admitted to the organisation. But she has a valid apprehension. "If men are around, women will not participate freely and due to social conditioning, withdraw. Then our whole point would be lost," she says. But the very fact that even men find SEWA such an attractive proposition proves that the organisation has succeeded in making its presence felt effectively in its fight for a better deal for the poor.

Lapping up Land

IT'S A poet's paradise. The looming hill ranges of the Western Ghats drop sheer into the placid Arabian Sea forming breathtaking crescent-shaped beaches that once seemed to poet Rabindranath Tagore as if the hills seem to "throw out its arms to the shoreless open sea—the very image of an eagle striving to embrace the universe".

But the Indian Navy is moved by considerations other than beauty. It views the serene shores that form natural harbours in the North Kanara district of Karnataka as the most strategic maritime mooring in the Indian Ocean. The navy is acquiring 35 km of shoreline and 57,000 acres of land in Karwar and Ankola talukas to build a naval base so big that if it wanted, "the entire naval fleet could be anchored in it". In the next six years it will spend Rs 2,000 crore to make the Karwar naval base, as it is called, the "biggest in Asia" giving India a presence in the Indian Ocean that it never had before.

But what stands like the rock of Gibraltar between the Indian Navy and its ambitious plans are the 30,000 people who, when the base comes up, will literally be "thrown into the sea". These people have lived for years in 37 villages dotting the aquamarine shoreline and will be displaced from their traditional homes and vocations "in the country's interests". With neither the navy nor the state Government offering any suitable rehabilitation plan, the villagers of Karwar and Ankola have decided it's time they took matters into their own hands. They have formed an association of "would-be displaced" persons, sent a tersely-worded telegram to Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi stating they were "alarmed, agitated and grief-stricken"—and in December, 6,000 of them positioned themselves in front of the taluk board office for a month-long hunger strike, giving up only after Chief Minister Ramakrishna Hegde rushed down from Bangalore and personally assured them that he would safeguard their interests.

Map by B.K. SHARMA

They plan to resume their hunger strike later this month and have fielded a candidate for the assembly elections in March. Even the village children have joined the struggle and last fortnight a district-level debate for high school and college students on the naval base was organised in Ankola. Those who spoke against the setting up of the base won by handsome margins.

The villagers have a clear stand: the navy is welcome to have its base but by using only 5 km of shoreline and 9,000 acres of land. But the navy kept jacking up its demand for land and as the plans for the base became more ambitious the villagers became increasingly desperate. In 1981 when the base was first mooted it wanted only 1,574 acres of land in Ar... Now it wants 57,220 acres, almost ... times its original need. Said S.K. Pai, advocate in Karwar: "The navy is trying to grab all available land like the octopus stretching its tentacles at all possible preys at once." "We may have to shed our blood," added association secretary Ram Gopal Naik ominously.

Of the 57,000-odd acres, almost 44,000—or two-thirds of the land to be acquired—come under forests, mostly of the scrub kind. Private lands held mainly by small holders total around 13,000 acres. While the navy has promised not to damage the forests in any way, 5,3... fishermen would be asked to shift and another 8,550 families owning paddy fields or coconut gardens would have to look for newer pastures. With their ... ture, almost 16,000 agricultural labourers would be rendered jobless.

What has further irked both the people and the state Government is the navy's secretive attitude about the entire project. When state government officials asked naval officers why they needed so much land they were curtly told: "This is none of your business. It's a top defence secret." Hordes of surveyors strutted over their land demarcating the area. Naval helicopters hovered around the top brass in the navy and the Union defence secretary making numerous on-the-spot studies. Things almost came to a head when the villagers learnt that the late prime minister Mrs Indira Gandhi was to have laid the foundation stone for the naval base in the Binaga cove called "Blue Lagoon" on November 8. But with her assassination it has been postponed.

As the plans for the ambitious base are moving steadily ahead, the people are growing panicky. Neither the state Government nor the navy has so far come up with any resettlement plans. R. Suresh, the deputy commissioner of North Kanara district, said: "The Government is extremely sensitive about this issue. When we asked the navy, they said rehabilitation is our baby. We told them OK but we need more money. Much more." The navy insists that it will meet only the cost of land acquisition and compensation which would amount to Rs 30 crore. But the state Government says that it must chip in money for the rehabilitation project that it estimates would amount to Rs 100 crore.

BUT THE navy will get its base. It has powerful reasons for pushing the project through. For long the navy has remained the Cinderella of the three armed forces, with defence planners concentrating more on the country's northern frontiers. But with the Indian Ocean becoming an extremely sensitive zone—especially after the US established the Diego Garcia base—India now feels the need to defend the 2.2 million square miles of the ocean which it considers its own. Karwar is an ideal place because it is out of reach of Pakistani F-16 s and its natural harbours are one of the best facilities for setting up such a base. The navy has three other major bases: at Bombay, Cochin and Vishakhapatnam, all overcrowded and in need of modernisation.

Karwar has for long been ignored because it had no advocates in free India. Though as far back as 1860 British naval engineer Sir Arthur Cotton recommended that there is "scarcely a harbour in the world that has a more remarkable collection of advantages than Karwar... and it would seem madness to neglect it". In fact Karwar was so badly neglected that when the navy decided to survey its facilities they found that not even a map of the area was available.

The Karwar coastline has many inbuilt advantages. The cluster of islands around it protect it from the south-west monsoon making it an ideal all-weather port. Water levels around the harbour average a remarkable seven fathoms, a little more than the six required by most warships. Dredging of sand is reduced to a minimum. There are no strong currents or heavy swells that catch sailors by surprise nor are there any shoals, sandbanks and reefs that could make navigating dangerous. The towering hillsides offer a perfect camouflage for naval activity. Apart from that the nearest rail head is at Hubli, about 150 km away. There is plenty of water for drinking. Electricity is in abundance with the giant Kalinadi hydro electric project only 80 km away. And all the major sea lanes of communication to India are close to Karwar. According to a naval expert: "Mobility, surprise, dispersal and offensive power are the keynotes for any naval base and Karwar fits the bill ideally."

Villagers uniting to protest: inadequate compensation and rehabilitation plans
